The Secret Language of Relationships: Your Complete Personology Guide to Any Relationship with Anyone illuminates and reveals the mystery of human relations in its many forms. Created by Gary Goldschneider and Joost Elffers, this fascinating work is the companion volume to their best-selling The Secret Language of Birthdays. The first book presents “personology,” the study of personality types based on the theory that people born on the same day or even during the same week share unique characteristics. More detailed than traditional sun-sign astrology, with its twelve signature personality types, personology divides the year into forty-eight “weeks,” and, thus, describes the specific personality traits for those born during these weeks or periods.

The Secret Language of Relationships presents relationship profiles between any two individuals based on their period personalities, for a remarkable 1,176 total possible combination summaries. It answers the questions: What would happen if these two personality types came together, their energies merging into yet another distinct entity? What would be the traits of this third new energy? Further, it confirms that the whole is truly greater than the sum of its parts: Indeed, the underlying truth at the heart of the book is that a relationship is a third distinct entity in any union of two people.

The Secret Language of Relationships examines an amazing 1,176 combinations—all forty-eight periods combined with one another. The Relationship Location Finder, printed on the book’s front and back endpaper, is designed to make finding a particular relationship profile easy: Locate the place where the birthdays of the two people in question intersect to find the page number of the profile. Then learn what the relationship—whether real or theoretical—is all about. Relationships of all stripes are discussed—not just love and marriage—but friendship, career, parent-child, and sibling. Photographs of famous couples—in love and otherwise, more than 2,500 pairings—beautifully illustrate the text. What well-known people have the same relationship as you?

Every coupling results in three—you, me, and it. Being cognizant of this fact can immeasurably improve one’s chances for a loving and lasting relationship. The key to this is simple: Understand yourself, understand your partner, and understand your relationship. The Secret Language of Relationships shows the way and is the secret to relationship success.

BIRTHDAY PERIOD OF SECOND PERSON

How to use this chart:

Locate the period of the first person's birthday across the top of the chart and the period of the second person's birthday along the side. The point where the two lines intersect is the page number where the relationship profile of this combination can be found.

Each individual birthday is contained within forty-eight periods of the year. Personology profiles of each period are located on pages 19 to page 211.

Introduction

Aside from our entrance into this world and our exit from it, it is rarely our fate to be alone. In fact, the common wisdom is that creatures raised in isolation withdraw, go mad, can even wither and, ultimately, die. So, this need for others appears to be inescapable.

The inevitable other can be friend or foe, lover or mate, parent or child, employer or servant. Some would say that our lives consist of nothing more than a series of interactions with these and other people. These interactions, whether brief or long-lasting, are relationships. But such relationships in themselves may not satisfy our deepest longings. Most of us desire that one special person with whom we can share our joys and sorrows, our triumph and despair, the one with whom we can be most ourselves. For many of us, just one other person is enough, and the magic of meeting such a person, the shock of recognition, can be among the most heartfelt and thrilling of human experiences. Searching for this individual gives us a reason to go on, becomes of paramount importance. Without an appreciative partner with whom to share our lives, the glory of riches, of fame, of achievement fades to dust and ashes.

Most of our relationships are due to chance. Truly, few of our significant others are chosen by us. We do not pick our parents, siblings, children, co-workers, or neighbors. Even those who are closest to us, our lovers, mates or friends, have usually come to us through some fortunate twist of fate that placed them in our path. Rarely are our relations due to objective forethought. Love is indeed blind to conscious decision making. It is the most subjective of experiences.

Just who, exactly, are these others who populate our lives? What are their deepest longings, sorrows, triumphs and joys? Can any of us possibly understand them any more than we understand ourselves? In fact, interaction with others takes much of our energy and fills our waking hours with a myriad of emotions and thoughts, as we sail through our days and are forced to encounter those who are, essentially, strangers. And what about the firm rule of many psychological theories and spiritual teachings: the other is the self? That is, the being that we encounter in the other is really just an aspect of ourselves, positive or negative, and thus is nothing more than a mirror for who we are.

Looking into the eyes of another and seeing our own image leads us to wonder whether that other person is not really a reflection of our own psyche, a summoning up of our needs, our wants, our expectations. Further, if this is the case, is it because we attracted or are attracted to someone like ourselves, or because we are unable to perceive anything beyond our own experience? Whatever the case, the other may also serve a practical purpose—may be someone whom we need emotionally or physically and who provides great interest but also one on whom we come to depend symbiotically to fulfill the responsibilities of everyday life. Yet there are those who never look beyond the roles or needs that others fill, or reflect on the enigma of another's inner life.

But the mystery of a human being is surpassed by a still deeper paradox, and that is the nature of the relationship we form with the other. A person is real, at times all too real, and his or her existence can be affirmed at any moment by the senses of sight, touch and hearing. The Third entity, the relationship itself is just as real but more difficult to apprehend or define. Individual differences are somehow transcended in the process of its formation, and it can have an enormous influence on the individuals who comprise it, often altering them significantly for life.

A relationship is a rather mysterious and amazing third entity, one that can come to lead an existence independent of the will or desire of its two partners, once things get going. As a matter of fact, in certain cases a relationship can prove far stronger than either individual, leading us to believe that a certain kind of synergy is at work. The energy of the whole (the relationship) is often far greater than that of the sum of its parts (the two individuals who make it up).

In the Tao Te Ching, Lao Tzu wrote, "The Tao begot the one. The One begot two. Two begot three. And the three begot the ten thousand things." In this context, the third is the relationship, and it is through relating to others that many of us reach our most creative peaks, and achieve our greatest ends. Formed by the co-mingling of its partners' energies, if you will, or strengths, weaknesses, and personality quirks, this new third form, the relationship, has its own personality, its own strengths, its own weaknesses. It is a wise person who understands this. Moreover, is it possible that what attracts us to someone in many cases is less who the other is and more what the relationship is—what we may potentially create together. Is it possible that our subconscious minds are sufficiently sophisticated to know, on a very subtle level, what a relationship's potential is even as our eyes first meet at someone else's across a room?

Surely relating to others is the crucible through which most of us experience our greatest sorrows and most ecstatic joys. Often, it is the locus of our greatest personal lessons and growth. Our struggle with the other leads us always back to ourselves. Thus the circle closes.

As everyone knows, not all relationships are easy ones for any given individual. Many are fraught with difficulties, and some types are more complicated than others: for example, the employer-worker relationship will be different from the sibling one, carrying with it different expectations and sensitivities. Of course, the type of relationship that often engages most of our interest and energy is the intimate one. It is this much sought-after relationship, the romantic one, that is highly prized in our popular culture today.

Unfortunately, not all couples, by a long shot, are suited to be in love relationships with each other. Successful and long-lasting love affairs require a special chemistry that many long for but few attain, aside from, perhaps, at fleeting moments. So much of falling in love seems based on illusion, which, although pleasurable initially, can leave a swath of destruction in its wake. Both partners can be struck by a thunderbolt, swept away on the wings of desire, only to wake up one day a bit sadder and wiser. Friendships may be longer lasting, sometimes for a lifetime, but may also slowly disintegrate, wear out their usefulness, or suddenly collapse overnight. Some of the most powerful emotive states known to mankind carry with them little guarantee of success or permanence. Yet along with marriage, these are the very states in which most individuals are willing not only to invest everything they have but also to submerge or even sacrifice their own individuality.

Thus the topic of relationships is a key one in our lives, and our successes and failures go a long way toward determining our level of contentment. Building a good relationship is really less an act of construction than working with what exists. It seems to depend a great deal on maintaining a healthy balance between the individual ego and the group spirit, or between selfishness and surrender. Above all, building a good relationship depends on understanding each person's wants and needs, and the relationship's own positive and negative qualities, and then negotiating and crafting something that takes all of this into consideration. It is an act of creation based on a few givens.

Never before in the history of mankind have so many of us been so free to make our relationships into whatever we wish them to be. The stranglehold of proscribed social and political roles and even sexuality is lessening in many parts of the world. As the old structures are being torn down, will we be able to build new ones based on mutual respect and consideration? Simply by virtue of living in this time, many of us have been given the opportunity to create our relationships as we would like to have them. We do not need to have the same relationship that our neighbor has, that our parents have, that our children have. We can create, but the "we" in that sentence is all important, for, like most things in our lives, we must do it with someone else.

Perhaps relationships are ultimately more human than people themselves. After all, if we look at the human being anatomically or biochemically, we will find much in common with all living creatures here on earth, but what separates us from them, in many ways, is the great range and complexity of the way we relate to each other. In fact, it could be argued that aliens would find our relationships with each other infinitely more interesting and revealing than our individual bodies and psyches alone. To picture a person in isolation makes practically no sense—it contradicts what the human being is all about, namely, personal and social interaction.

The Book's Structure

In the pages that follow, this volume attempts to illuminate relationships as entities. Presented here are 1,176 descriptions of different relationships. These were arrived at using the personology theory outlined in this book's companion volume, The Secret Language of Birthdays. It is our hope that these relationship descriptions will be used as a jumping-off point for those interested in deepening their understanding of their relationships.

tics of anyone born within these dates. In other words, those born in the same period will share certain predictable character traits. While this may not completely represent every individual, it is sufficient to provide an understanding of his or her basic energies. Extrapolating from the personology periods, it is possible to predict the nature of the relationship between any two people. Thus The Secret Language of Relationships combines each period of the year with itself and every other period to predict the nature of the resulting relationship.

For example, a person born on March 31 falls into the Aries I period. This is the Week of the Child, which symbolizes the freshness and openness of early childhood and of the spring season (lasting from March 25 to April 2). People born during this time are characterized by a childlike, enthusiastic orientation. This in contrast to a person born on November 10, who would be a Scorpio II (encompassing November 3 to 11). Born in the fall, which is symbolically likened to middle age, this week takes Depth as its central symbol. Thus, it becomes possible to consider the theoretical implications of an Aries I–Scorpio II relationship.

It is recommended that readers get to know their own particular period as well as possible, and for this reason four pages are devoted to each of the forty-eight periods or weeks. In addition, when studying your relationship with another person, you should also review in some depth the description of his or her period. This will help you better understand your relationship profile. Try to apply this understanding in your daily life. The personology period descriptions appear on pages 19 to 212. Also included is a handy reference table to the location and name of each period's matchup with every other.

The Combinations or Profiles

Many astrology books have presented the signs in love, showing how Gemini and Virgo or Capricorn and Aquarius relate to each other, but, as discussed earlier, personology posits that there are five equally important types of Geminis. Each will behave differently, including in relationships. Thus in personology, much more specific relationships can be defined.

The Grand Cycle of Life

The theory of personology posits that astrology, history and psychology are related to the congruence of three cycles: the astrological zodiac, the earth's rotation around the sun as represented by the seasons of the year and the typical path of a human life. First presented in The Secret Language of Birthdays, "The Grand Cycle of Life" shows how the twelve signs of the zodiac, the seasons of the year and the stages of human life from childhood to old age unfold in a similar fashion. In personology, the twelve primary astrological signs as symbols of personality type are replaced by forty-eight periods—twelve cusps and thirty-six weeks. The result is a more detailed approach to personality characteristics.

The Secret Language of Relationships presents "The Grand Cycle of Life" on pages 9 through 17 in order to orient the reader to the personology system. This is followed by a greatly amplified description of the forty-eight periods that goes far beyond that presented in The Secret Language of Birthdays. These forty-eight sturdy pillars of the personology system are highly original representations of the middle ground between the more specific 366 personality types keyed to each birthday of the year, on the one hand, and the more general twelve zodiac signs, on the other.

The Personology Periods

The forty-eight personology periods, made up of twelve cusps and thirty-six weeks, are units between six and nine days in length. Personology predicts the personality characteris-

Using This Book

Using the book is extremely simple. First, consult the chart found on page 12 to determine in which period your birthday falls. Next, find the period in which the person who interests you is born. This can be anyone: friend, parent, child, lover, mate, co-worker. Finally, consulting the endpapers at the front and back of this book (next to the covers), point to your birth period with one finger and to the other person's birth period with another and find the point of intersection, as though you were using a road mileage map to find the distance between two cities. At that point you will find the page number to be consulted for your relationship. Or, if you would prefer, consult your birth period, found on pages 19 to 211. There you will find the chart of all your relationships with people born in the other forty-eight periods and their page locations.

The Secret Language of Relationships gives a description of the 1,176 combinations of the forty-eight personology periods with each other. If you are a Leo II, for example, you will be able to find all of your possible forty-eight combinations, including that with another Leo II. Each matchup is discussed in relation to five principal life areas: love, marriage, friendship, family and work. Of course, these may overlap, to a greater or lesser extent. Other types of relationships, such as teacher-student, adversarial or competitive, primarily sexual, acquaintanceships and partnerships, are also considered.

The possible number of different combinations of the forty-eight periods with each other is given by the formula  $n(n+1)/2$  and calculates out to 1,176 possible matchups. Traditional sun-sign astrology describes only seventy-eight possible relationship types between the twelve signs. The Secret Language of Relationships offers about fifteen times as many combinations as sun-sign astrology and thus can be much more specific.

The 1,176 matchups begin on page 213 and are presented in the following manner. Beginning with the first period, Pisces-

Aries cusp, all the forty-eight relationships of these people born between March 19 and March 24, including the relationship between Pisces-Aries cusp and Pisces-Aries cusp, are laid out, two to a page. Following these, the forty-seven new relationships of the following period, Aries I, are shown. Why only forty-seven? Because the relationship of Aries I with Pisces-Aries cusp (its preceding period) has already been discussed in the section on Pisces-Aries relationships. When Aries II's relationships are presented, there are now only forty-six, since two have already been discussed, one under Pisces-Aries and one under Aries I. Thus the number of possible relationships becomes 48,47,46,45. . . until the last relationship, Pisces III with Pisces III, is reached. The formula  $n(n+1)/2$ , where  $n=48$ , is revealed as being equal to  $1+2+3+4+5 \dots 48$ . As mentioned previously, your relationship can be found by using the charts on the inside of the cover at the front and back of the book, or by looking up your period on pages 19 to 211 to find the table of each period's matchup with every other period and the page number of your matchup with your partner.

A Brief Overview of Personology

Personology is like astrology in that it recognizes the original twelve heavenly constellations (and the signs derived from them) that form the band called the zodiac, which encircles our earth. However, personology goes further by concentrating on the overlapping area between two signs called the cusp. For example, four of the twelve cusps have immense importance for life as it is lived here on earth, since the spring equinox, the summer solstice, the fall equinox and the winter solstice mark the boundaries of the seasons themselves. Spring, summer, fall and winter succeed one another in an orderly rhythm, for the most part, and structure life on the planet along with the unvarying diurnal changes of day and night. In terms of the signs, these cusps are Pisces-Aries (spring equinox), Gemini-Cancer (summer solstice), Virgo-Libra (fall equinox) and Sagittarius-Capricorn (winter solstice), in the northern hemisphere. In personology the names of these cusps are The Primal Cusp, The Cusp of Magic, The Cusp of Beauty and The Cusp of Prophecy, respectively. In personology, those born during these and the other eight cusp periods of six to seven days will share certain characteristics, the descriptions or predictions of which are far broader than those of single sun signs as in astrology. In other words, there is such a thing as a distinct cusp personality.

Cusp people are different from others not only because they embody a blend of the sharply contrasting traits of two adjacent signs (such as Aries and Taurus, or Gemini and Cancer) but also because their individuality is not determined by a major sign of the zodiac but frequently by something more indefinable. They are earth-oriented, unpredictable, difficult, unconventional, perhaps. Often those born on cusps find each other extremely attractive, which may or may not bode well for their forming a permanent relationship.

Further, in those astrological periods of about a month between cusps, traditionally known as signs, we find different representations of personality based on where a week or period falls in the month. In personology, these months or signs are further divided into three weeks. For example, Libra I's are Libras in orientation but have certain traits that are unique and that differentiate them from Libra III's.

Looking at each of the astrological signs from a personological point of view, we find five principal types of each sign: on either side the two cusps that demarcate it and in its center the approximately week-long periods, three in number. For this reason, while a sun-sign astrologer speaks about an Aries, a Scorpio or a Capricorn, a personologist may refer to an Aries II, a Scorpio-Sagittarius, or a Capricorn III. Instead of there being a "Virgo" personality, as presented in the sun-sign astrology system, in personology there are five types of Virgos: Leo-Virgo cusp (August 19-25, The Cusp of Exposure), Virgo I (August 26-September 2, The Week of System Builders), Virgo II (September 3-10, The Week of the Enigma), Virgo III (September 11-18, The Week of the Literalist) and finally, Virgo-Libra cusp (The Cusp of Beauty, September 19-24). Of course, since cusps are shared by two signs, this last cusp becomes the first period of the five different kinds of Libras. In The Secret Language of Birthdays, these periods were further broken down into discrete personality characteristics for each day of the year.

Which Are the Best Combinations for You?

Conventional sun-sign astrology has maintained that in general the best signs for you are the ones that are trine to your sun sign (120° away from your sign in the zodiac). In fact, this means the signs that are of the same element as yours. In other words, if you are a Taurus (an earth sign), things should go well with Virgo and Capricorn, the other two earth signs. Similarly, the three water signs (Cancer, Scorpio, Pisces), the three air signs (Gemini, Libra, Aquarius) and the three fire signs (Aries, Leo, Sagittarius) are recommended to each other. Although this theory makes sense, it does not always work in practice, particularly when it comes to sustaining interest over a long period of time. In fact, it often seems that the best combinations are ones that sun-sign astrology rarely suggests: the two signs on either side of and the one opposite yours. For example, if you are a Taurus, it is not necessarily the other two earth signs but rather the sign before yours, Aries, the sign after yours, Gemini, and the sign opposite yours, Scorpio, that are a good bet and your favorites.

In The Secret Language of Relationships the situation is much more complex, since there are not only five types of each sign but also at least five different areas of life in which relationships can manifest themselves. Making any hard and fast rules is difficult. However, if you look at the four-page descriptions of your period you will find a list of the best periods for you to get involved with in each of the categories, a list that has been culled from the results found in your forty-eight matchups.

Once you begin to embrace personology and work with The Secret Language of Relationships, you may be interested to see which types of people you tend to be involved with. Observe your relationships past and present. You might find, as we did, that many of the people in your life are frequently born in the same weeks of the year. In other words, we are attracted to the same personality types and combinations, over and over again.

Recommendations for the best combinations by category for any one period are provided on a chart in each period description found on pages 19 to 211.

How the Relationships Were Revealed

Four primary but different tools were used to create the relationship profiles or combinations in this book. The first was to draw a bead on what the relationship between two people is all about, its main energies or focus. This was crafted based on a traditional astrological tool called the “composite chart,” a fascinating method propounded and endorsed by astrologer Robert Hand, in his book Planets in Composite. It involves synthesis, in which a combination horoscope is made from the two originals. This composite chart is built up from a series of midpoints between the planets of the two individual charts. The composite or midpoint method creates a new chart for the relationship itself; it is viewed as a new entity, with its own character, strengths and weaknesses: a synergy, if you will, of each person’s traits.

Also employed was another traditional astrological tool called synastry. This second method involves examining both partners’ individual characteristics and comparing them point by point for compatibility. Thus we go from viewing the relationship as a discrete entity in itself to focusing on the individuals and their interaction.

The third method used was to create an imaginary psychodrama, in which hypothetical individuals from two periods were allowed to interact. For example, by placing a theoretical prototype of a Gemini II and Scorpio III in a variety of situations (domestic, professional, intimate, etc.), their interaction could be viewed and studied psychologically.

Finally, biographical as well as personal information about well-known couples and those personally known to the authors provided a reliable source of insight and most interesting observations.

Thus relationship profiles presenting their core energies and tendencies were created. However, these could be applied to many different kinds of relationships, so a decision was made to look at five of them.

The Five Relationship Categories

Love

Under this category are included intimate relationships ranging from platonic to sexual in nature. It should be noted that love means different things to different people. In addition, every type of relationship probably involves some sort of love, to a greater or lesser extent. Yet to call a mother-son relationship, a sibling matchup or a friendship a love relationship does not seem appropriate. Therefore, love is used as the name of this category, without implying in any way that it lays claim to that emotion exclusively.

Traditionally, a love affair is considered by psychologists as an entity limited in duration and more likely than not to eventually disintegrate, perhaps due to a lack of social commitment, involvement and support. These relationships tend to be characterized by an emotional intensity that may be difficult to sustain and an absence of reality-based thinking on the part of the partners. Many love relationships are kept hidden because of fear of disapproval or rejection, often familial in nature. The fact that such relationships tend not to have a realistic basis does not make them less likely to occur; on the contrary, it is often the incongruous and unimaginable that precipitates them taking place.

Sexual attraction is discussed in this category for the most part. Yet romantic feelings are not in any way restricted to the erotic, and some romance can manifest itself in many of the personology combinations that have little to do with physicality.

In most love relationships, psychological projection, replaying scripts from childhood, acting out, and a whole host of emotions including jealousy, anger, a desire to dominate and control, nurturing and protective impulses, violence, narcissism, idolatry and even worship struggle for the ascendancy. Maddening, exalting, thrilling and frustrating, the promise of love continues to drive human beings into these situations in their search for the perfect partner.

Marriage

In an age in which over half of marriages end in divorce, it is puzzling why so many people still get married. What is even more puzzling is why they take the oath to love each other exclusively in the light of statistics on infidelity. Yet marriage is a powerful social institution, and the raising of children within the conjugal family unit is still the widely accepted norm. The Secret Language of Relationships considers that the question of whether two people are suited for one another maritally is of vital importance, particularly if children are to be involved. Moreover, it cannot be assumed that love is always the main motivating factor in marriage or the one that holds such units together. The emphasis in this area is on pointing out matchup strengths having to do with shared values that are of a more practical, financial, social, intellectual or aesthetic nature.

Friendship

Deep friendship has elements of love and marriage built into it. Two friends can be extremely self-sufficient and not in need of much external input. Should such friends also be engaged in professional ventures with each other, they may in fact spend much more time together than lovers or spouses. If one makes a list of close friends, it is quite likely that their birthdays are not spread out equally around the year but are clumped into certain areas. The Secret Language of Relationships does its best to alert the reader to certain combinations that can prove highly beneficial in the sphere of friendship and others that, although attractive, had best not be developed.

Family

The family relationships most often discussed are parent-child and sibling combinations, although grandparents and more distant relatives are also mentioned occasionally. Here some of the most possessive and destructive drives of human beings come out, whereby many parents are all too prone to push their children to make up for their own failures and inadequacies.

Parents and children are urged to build bonds of trust and acceptance, because sooner or later they will have to confront their problems and come to some sort of peace with each other.

Work

Most work relationships are fortuitous; two individuals are thrown together in an office or other work unit and have to make the best of it. However, it may be useful for personnel officers to check both The Secret Language of Birthdays and The Secret Language of Relationships for a quick hit on whether two people have compatible personalities. In the work category, The Secret Language of Relationships considers co-workers, boss-employee pairs, administrative colleagues, business partners, entrepreneurs and freelancers as categories worthy of special recommendation or warning. Also, certain work relationships are more likely to develop into productive friendships than others.

Three analogies may help to describe the nature of a relationship in terms of certain physical and metaphysical models:

1. Physical versus Chemical Reaction

In a physical reaction two substances are mixed or ground together without being transformed—that is, both can be recovered from such a mixture in their original state. A chemical reaction, on the other hand, produces an entirely new substance from the two reactants, one that is very different from either of the reactants and does not easily yield the original substances back again. A relationship is more like the resulting compound in a chemical reaction—it is a discrete third entity that is more than just a mixture of the other two, rather a new substance in itself.

2. Interface

When two objects touch each other, the edge or border at which they meet, the interface, has quite different properties from those of the original objects. Interfaces are not easy to define, and in some ways transcend the two objects themselves. When you slowly reach out to touch the image of yourself that you see in a mirror; the point of touching the glass can be as strange as disturbing your reflection in a pool of clear water or trying to shake free from your shadow. A relationship could be motivated by the desire on the part of one or both partners to break through the interface and interact with the person on the other side. Such interactions usually involve a mingling or merging of your being with theirs, often resulting in a miraculous transformation.

2. Ecstasy

The poet John Donne conceives of the process as one of soul-merger. In his poem The Ecstasie, he pictures two lovers lying on a grassy bank, staring into each other's eyes. Their souls, marching forth from their confinement in the body, proceed to advance toward each other along the "double string" of their eye connections until finally merging with each other. Although the lovers' bodies are physically entwined, more important is that their spiritual selves also become joined. The word "ecstasy" is from the Latin ex stasis, meaning to stand outside of oneself. In other words, it is the soul expressing itself beyond the bounds of the physical.

Keys to a Good and Lasting Relationship

When a relationship between individual A and individual B is discussed, do we mean the dynamic that goes on in private between these two individuals or the relationship unit AB, which interacts with the world around it? Of course, the relationship AB is present in public or private, but the degree to which A and B identify with it, and give up their individual identities to become it, is of utmost importance. There are no hard and fast rules for such surrender to the relationship. In some cases, or at certain times in the life of a relationship, it will be necessary for A or B to pull back and affirm his or her own individual identity once more, perhaps even to the point of setting out once again on his or her own path. However, peak experiences between two people are only really possible through surrender—that is, giving up a good measure of individual ego in service of the relationship, AB. Each person will get something back that is much more valuable. A few additional guidelines follow:

1. Listen to what your partner is saying.
2. Truly share. Solely giving or taking is not the answer, but only a combination of the two in equal measure.
3. Give unconditionally. To give while expecting a return or certain results is the same as paying for something.
4. Kindness, understanding, trust and consideration are worth more than all the selfish pleasure you can gain. If you are in it only for what you can get, forget about meaningful relationships.

5. Don't let anyone treat you abusively. Demand respect.
6. By refusing to make decisions, express disapproval or take a stand you may really be just avoiding taking responsibility for your own actions. Fear of rejection is usually behind such an agreeable facade.
7. Beware of possessiveness and claiming behavior. Your partner is his or her own person and should never be treated as an object or possession.
8. Refuse to allow others to push your buttons. One trick is to grow a whole new set of buttons that cannot be pushed so easily.
9. Much can be learned from self-observation. In the midst of an argument, try backing off and observing yourself. By being both the observer and observed, you will increase your awareness.
10. Control your aggressive and violent side. At the same time, seek outlets for your feelings and do not repress them. Working out differences through calm discussion is often the best way.
11. Learn to postpone your gratification through patience, trust and understanding.
12. Acceptance is important but does not imply agreement. Agree to disagree. Do not insist that you and your partner must see eye to eye.
13. Try to distinguish between needs and wants. What you seem to want most is not what you really need, in many cases.
14. Be sensitive to kairos, the right time for an action to take place. What will work well under one set of circumstances will be entirely wasted under another.
15. Respect your partner's space.

The Grand Cycle of Life

The Grand Cycle of Life is a continuous process of growth, development, and transformation. It begins in the Spring of Youth, where the seed of life is planted. In the Summer of Adulthood, the seed grows into a young plant, reaching its full potential. In the Autumn of Middle Age, the plant begins to mature, its leaves turning golden. In the Winter of Old Age, the plant reaches its final stage, its leaves falling and its roots deepening. The cycle then begins anew, as the seed of life is planted again.

The Grand Cycle of Life

All of life can be conceived symbolically as one grand cycle. By analogy, three important areas can be studied and compared within a circular framework: human life, nature, astrology. For humans, the circle may represent a lifetime, from birth to death; for nature, the inexorable succession of the seasons through a year; in astrology, the zodiac, depicting the signs and their positions. The circle on which these three worlds are based is divided by two axes: one horizontal, one vertical. To travel through a cycle, one need only begin at the left end-point of the horizontal axis and proceed in a counterclockwise direction until one arrives back at the beginning.

The four most important points on the circumference of the circle are where the two axes touch it (see Fig. 1 below).

Upper and Lower Halves of the Circle

As shown in Fig. 2, the horizontal axis splits the circle into two halves. The lower half of the circle, or first half of the life cycle, represents objective, outward growth in human and natural terms (birth to age forty-two, spring to fall). During this period, dramatic physical growth takes place that transforms both individuals and the landscape. These objective changes in humans are paralleled by a deeply personal way of viewing the world. Thus, in astrological or psychological terms the lower half may be seen as subjective (more unconscious) and the first six signs, ruled by the “inner” planets (Mercury, Venus, Mars) and two luminaries (Sun, Moon) in our solar system, can be classified as “personal” signs. These five heavenly bodies are almost always viewed in terms of everyday feelings and emotions, familial and romantic relationships with others, and matters of the here and now, rather than more complex philosophical matters or universal concerns. The dominant faculties here are themselves more subjective—intuition and feeling. We may say, then, that the first half of life manifests objectively but is unconscious in its psychological orientation.

The upper half of the circle, or second half of the life cycle, represents subjective, inward growth in human and natural terms (age 42–84, fall to spring). During this period, both in nature and the human psyche, a deepening and maturation takes place beneath the surface of life. This “underground” activity is accompanied by an ever-increasing objectivity in the way human beings are able to view events around them, resulting in a wiser outlook and perhaps a more pragmatic view of things. Thus, in

Fig. 4. The seasons of the year, the ideal duration of a human life (one Uranus cycle of eighty-four years) and the twelve signs of the zodiac are here equally divided in four.

QUAD	SEASON	AGE	SIGNS	CHANGE	MANIFESTATION	ORIENTATION
I	Spring	0–21	A,T,G	Waxing	Objective	Unconscious
II	Summer	21–42	C,L,V	Waning	Objective	Unconscious
III	Fall	42–63	L,S,S	Waning	Subjective	Conscious
IV	Winter	63–84	C,A,P	Waxing	Subjective	Conscious

astrological and psychological terms the upper half can be viewed as being objective (more conscious): signs 7–9 can be classified as “social” and signs 10–12 “universal.” Except for Libra, these six signs are all ruled by the “outer,” impersonal planets in our solar system (Jupiter, Saturn, Uranus, Neptune, Pluto). These massive and distant bodies carry more universal and philosophical associations. They symbolize larger social questions: fate, destiny, and the inexorable and eternal aspects of life. The dominant faculties here are more objective ones—sensation and thought. Thus, the second half of life is the reverse of the first, i.e., it manifests subjectively (inside, beneath the surface) but is more conscious in its psychological orientation.

The Quadrants

The two sets of hemispheres just presented (upper-lower, left-right) may be combined simply by superimposing them on each other. In this way, the three hundred and sixty degree circle of life is divided into four quadrants. In the human lifetime of eighty-four years, each of these quadrants represents a period of twenty-one years; in the yearly cycle of nature, a season; in astrology, a group of three signs (the order of which is invariably cardinal, fixed and mutable). This information is summarized in Fig. 4 above.

In addition, each of these quadrants may be associated with a mode of apprehending the world:

- I Intuition
- II Feeling
- III Sensation
- IV Thought

Each of the four quadrants then, whether representing a season, a twenty-one year period of life or a ninety-degree slice of the zodiac, can be assessed in terms of change, manifestation, orientation and a mode of apprehension.

Because personology is based on a distinctly earth-oriented system, the two equinoxes and solstices occupy a position of central importance in demarcating The Grand Cycle of Life. In this respect, the traditional heavenly-oriented astrological view is given a shift of emphasis to the here and now of our daily life—the eternal cyclical progression of the seasons and life periods, the rhythms of existence which we experience year after year on our home planet.

The 48 Periods and Cusps

Personology divides the year into forty-eight periods, each associated with distinct personality characteristics typical of people born during these periods. The essence of these traits is represented by the name of each period. Personology's forty-eight periods and their names are listed here.

Spring

March 21–June 21

The beginning of the astrological year has been fixed as 0° Aries (March 21) by modern astrology. On this spring or vernal equinox, which symbolizes rebirth, days and nights are of equal length. Astrology has taken the northern hemisphere for its model (March 21 marks the beginning of spring in the northern hemisphere, but in the southern hemisphere spring begins around September 23). As spring wears on, the days grow longer and the nights shorter. Spring is the first quarter, or 90° segment, of the yearly cycle. It extends from the spring equinox to the summer solstice.

Springtime is traditionally the period of new growth. As the earth and air heat up, the fire of the sun melts the winter ice and snow. Spring rains coupled with swollen rivers bring water to the earth and new life bursts forth. Planting of crops and vegetables begins once the nights become shorter and all danger of freezing is past. Seeds germinate in the earth, plants sprout and quickly begin to grow. The first flowers blossom, and in combination with the birds and animals, perhaps newly-born, returned from migrations or awakened from hibernation, add beauty and liveliness to this quadrant of the year. Analogously, people spend more time outside and wear fewer but more colorful clothes as the days lengthen and the average temperature rises. More daylight means more time available for recreation and the enjoyment of natural surroundings.

The Signs and Life Periods

Spring comprises three astrological signs: the cardinal fire sign Aries, the fixed earth sign Taurus and the mutable air sign Gemini. In human terms, these three signs can be likened to the life of the individual from birth until age twenty-one. This active period of human development, which spans birth, infancy, childhood and adolescence, displays many of the same processes of growth, differentiation and development which occur in nature's springtime.

This first quadrant of The Grand Cycle of Life is governed by the faculty of intuition and can be seen as a waxing period which manifests objectively and has an unconscious orientation. That is to say, although objective growth is taking place externally in nature and in the human being during this period, the internal state is highly subjective.

Astrologically, this has to do with the fact that the signs Aries, Taurus and Gemini are ruled by the planets Mars, Venus and Mercury, respectively, all of which can be classified as “inner” or “personal” planets. This means that they are relatively small and close to the earth and the sun.

The period of human development age 0–21 also shows a highly subjective or personal orientation. The developing child sees the world largely as an extension of him/herself. Its apprehension of life is colored by intuitions and by powerful unconscious drives. The power of the child to absorb and assimilate impressions from the outside world is astonishing. Sometimes the young person is at the mercy of such powerful forces, and does not act in the most rational or conscious manner.

The Springtime Personality

Generally speaking, those born in the springtime manifest an enthusiasm for life. Their energy is prodigious where initiating projects is concerned, and their ability to survive and/or adapt is noteworthy. Often more extroverted than introverted, springtime people tend to impact heavily on their environment. However, their capacity to dutifully or doggedly stick to one activity is not necessarily great.

Springtime people like to share what they think, create and produce, and they are, more than those born in other seasons, in need of fairly constant appreciation and approval for what they do. A desire to be free characterizes many born in this season, and they may not react well to having restrictions imposed on them. Springtime people need to grow, expand and make their mark on the world.

Those born in the spring often carry a childlike air about them their whole life long. Innocence, spontaneity, impulse—these are all characteristic of springtime people. Generally positive in their outlook, they may be put off by highly serious attitudes and have little patience for those with negative orientations.

Summer

June 21–September 23

The summer solstice usually occurs on June 21 in the northern hemisphere (this date marks the beginning of summer in the northern hemisphere, but in the southern hemisphere summer begins on December 21). At this magical time, days are longer and nights shorter than at any other time of the year. As summer wears on, however, the days shorten and the nights lengthen. Summer is the second quarter, or 90° degree segment, of the yearly cycle. It extends from the summer solstice to the fall equinox.

Summer is traditionally the period in which the new life of springtime grows to maturity. Temperatures are at their warmest during this period, and most of animal life experiences lazy afternoons when it is too hot for much movement. This is traditionally the time for vacations, for taking off from work to enjoy all kinds of outdoor activities. School is out, and more young people are thus active and about in the mornings. Colorful flowers and blossoms abound. All the fullness and abundance of nature is revealed. The rhythm of life in this quadrant is slower and more sensual, but diets tend to be lighter, and clothing freer. Life is in many respects easier in summer than at any other time of the year.

The Signs and Life Periods

Summer comprises three astrological signs: the cardinal water sign Cancer, the fixed fire sign Leo and the mutable earth sign Virgo. In human terms, these three signs can be likened to the life of the individual aged 21–42. This dynamic period of human development, which spans early adulthood to the mid-life period, displays many of the same processes of growth, flowering and producing which occur in nature's summertime.

This second quadrant of The Grand Cycle of Life is governed by the faculty of feeling and can be seen as a waning period which manifests objectively and has an unconscious orientation. That is to say, although objective growth is taking place externally in nature and in the human being during this period, such growth has already slowed down. Like childhood, the orientation remains primarily subjective.

DOMINANT FACULTY Feeling

Astrologically speaking, this has to do with the fact that the signs Cancer, Leo and Virgo are ruled by the heavenly bodies The Moon, The Sun and Mercury, all of which are said to be "inner" or "personal" in the solar system. This means that they are relatively close to the earth and take approx. one month (for the Moon) and one year (for the Sun and Mercury) to travel around the zodiac.

Like childhood and adolescence, the period of human development age 21–42 is highly personal in outlook, but much objectivity and acquired wisdom has also manifested. The maturing adult is able to discriminate between his/her internal self and the outside world. Not everything is so highly colored by intuitions and powerful unconscious drives as before. Although the capacity to absorb and assimilate impressions is still great, many entryways to the personality and ego have already closed. The maturing adult is also far less at the mercy of the subjective self, and now acts in a more rational and conscious manner than before.

The Summertime Personality

Generally speaking, those born in the summertime have more measured responses than those born in the spring and, although enthusiastic, are more critical. Their energies are perhaps a bit less focused on initiating projects and more on bringing them to fruition. Summertime people tend to be a mixture of introvert and extrovert, but feelings now play a more important role in coloring their lives. Empathic urges to help and become involved with others are strong during this period. Summertime people often experience an emotional interaction not only with people but with their work and environment.

Summertime people may not display an overwhelming need to bring their contributions out in the world. Many hidden characteristics develop at this time, and being appreciated is not always the most important thing. Rather than placing their freedom and independence above all else, summertime people are prepared to serve others and also to invest time in them. Summertime people need to be needed.

Fall

September 23–December 21

The fall equinox usually occurs around September 23 in the northern hemisphere (though, of course, in the southern hemisphere fall begins on March 21). At this time of harvest, days and nights are again of equal length. As fall wears on, however, the days grow shorter and the nights longer. Fall is the third quarter, or 90° degree segment, of the yearly cycle. It extends from the fall equinox to the winter solstice.

Fall is traditionally the period at which time the final harvest of summer growth takes place—afterwards, much of the ground is covered by leaves or mulch for the winter. A decomposition of plant life now begins by which the earth is enriched. Most of the farmland lies fallow during this period but some winter crops can be planted. Temperatures begin to drop as the sun shares less of itself, and freezing nights are evinced by morning frost. Some animal life goes into hibernation or migrates to a warmer climate. Deciduous trees change color in riotous displays, and an autumn nip is in the air. The rhythm of life of this quadrant is quicker and more survival-oriented. High-energy or bulk diets are preferred here (both by animals and humans). The bounty of foodstuffs is waning, and life again becomes more difficult.

The Signs and Life Periods

Fall comprises three astrological signs: the cardinal air sign Libra, the fixed water sign Scorpio and the mutable fire sign Sagittarius. These three signs can be likened in human terms to the years 42–63 in the life of an individual. This powerful period of human development which spans the onset of the mid-life period to late middle age, evidences some of the same aspects of maturation, conservation of movement and energy, and added emphasis on survival, as does nature's autumn.

This third quadrant of The Grand Cycle of Life is governed by the faculty of sensation and can be seen as a waning period which manifests subjectively and has a conscious orientation. That is to say, subjective, underground, interior activity has replaced outward growth in both nature and the human being. But psychologically, a conscious and objective awareness of the process of aging are all too clear. Difficulty in accepting such changes, and often a need to control them, are also apparent.

Astrologically, this is related to the fact that the signs Libra, Scorpio and Sagittarius are ruled by the heavenly bodies Venus, Pluto and Jupiter, the last two of which are outer, “universal” planets. These outer planets are far from the earth and take approx. 12 years (for Jupiter) and 248 years (for Pluto) to travel around the zodiac. Venus, on the other hand, is a “personal” planet which lends strong social and sensuous influences.

Unlike the period from birth to the mid-life, the outlook of the adult at this time is more social than personal. Objectivity, criticism, conscious thought, and awareness characterize this intensely realistic period. A new seriousness and philosophical attitude appears. Intuition, feeling, and thought are all exercised, but sensation becomes a unifying theme, i.e., objective assessment of phenomena as well as a more conscious enjoyment of sensuous pleasures.

The Autumnal Personality

Generally speaking, those born in the fall demonstrate both a greater ability and need to control their external environment. Autumnal people are rarely as enthusiastic as those born in the spring and summer, being rather more selective and critical. Maintenance is the overriding consideration here rather than initiation or development of new projects. In some respects, autumnal people tend to be more introverted and thoughtful than springtime and summertime people. Feelings are kept under stricter control. Yet, social urges are more maturely and fully expressed here also—friendships, group and community activities, direct working contributions to society are important at this time. Autumnal people manifest a strong urge to share and take part in serious and fulfilling relationships.

Those born in the fall have a heightened awareness of what is going on around them, perhaps greater than that of any other seasonal group. Impulse and emotion may be lower key in autumnal people, but often more subtle and complex. Both self-understanding and self-control are given high priority.

Winter

December 21–March 21

The winter solstice usually occurs on December 21 in the northern hemisphere (this date marks the beginning of winter in the northern hemisphere, but in the southern hemisphere winter begins around June 21). At this time of stillness, nights are longer and days shorter than at any other time in the year. As winter advances through the bitter days and on to the hint of spring, the nights grow shorter and the days longer. Winter is the fourth and last quarter, or 90° degree segment, of the yearly cycle. This season extends from the winter solstice to the spring equinox.

Winter is traditionally the period at which the water in ponds and rivers freezes, snow falls, the sounds of nature are muted and the land lies sleeping under a white blanket. Trees stretch their bare arms into a gray sky only lit a few hours a day by a low rising sun. Although much of nature seems dead, this is only a surface view. Deep within the earth, powerful forces are engaged in a metamorphosis, the results of which will be evident to the eye in spring. Nothing really dies but is transformed into another state. There is a feeling of waiting, and of expectation. Life has moved inside and underground. Warmth is sought in caves and in houses from bitter, howling winds. Fire keeps humans warm and foods that have been stored for the winter are eaten by both people and animals.

The Signs and Life Periods

Winter comprises three astrological signs: the cardinal earth sign Capricorn, the fixed air sign Aquarius and the mutable water sign Pisces. These three signs can be likened in human terms to the life of the individual aged 63–84. This spiritual period of human development from late middle age to death, evidences many of the same aspects of stillness, interiorization of experience and a quieting of instinctual demands that characterize nature's winter.

This fourth quadrant of The Grand Cycle of Life is governed by the faculty of thought and can be seen as a waxing period which manifests subjectively and has a conscious orientation. Although subjective, underground, interior activity has completely replaced outward growth in both nature and the human being, objective changes are on the way. In the case of humans, consciousness may have become less concerned with the externals and more with the worlds of thought, religion, philosophy, spirituality and other universal concerns.

Astrologically, this is related to the fact that the signs Capricorn, Aquarius and Pisces are ruled by the heavenly bodies Saturn, Uranus and Neptune, which are all heavy, "outer" planets. These bodies are big and far from the earth, taking approximately 28, 84 and 165 years, respectively, to travel around the zodiac.

The outlook of the adult at this time is more universal. Such concerns as competing in the marketplace, raising a family, reproducing, building a powerful exterior and striving to change the world of society are generally diminishing or even completely absent now. The elder must prepare psychologically for the coming of the end of a life cycle.

The Wintertime Personality

Generally speaking, wintertime people are more concerned with the larger picture. They can be dominant types who rule their space with assurance, but often also display a greater degree of flexibility, sensitivity, acceptance and spirituality than those born at other times of the year. Although those born in the winter are often quiet types, many manifest great excitement through their thoughts, ideals and work. They are particularly distinguished by an active imagination and fantasy life. The most successful of wintertime people can objectify these visions and perhaps make them a source of creativity rather than be victimized by them. The allegiance of wintertime people is not so much to society or to personal considerations as to the world of ideas.

Wintertime people are less concerned with the state of the world as it is now and more with how it could and should be. A real reforming spirit can show itself in this personality, and an interest in matters concerning political and economic justice is very common.

The Cup of Rebirth

The Forty-eight Periods

PISCES-ARIES CUSP

The Cusp of Rebirth

The Pisces-Aries cusp is an admixture of the last sign of the zodiac, Pisces, and the first sign of the zodiac, Aries. This cusp can be likened symbolically to the beginning of each human life on earth as well as literally being the beginning of the astrological new year. Thus the Pisces-Aries cusp may be said to represent rebirth. Many civilizations have viewed the onset of spring (approx. March 21 in the northern hemisphere) as marking the year's beginning. This is emphasized by the words for spring in various languages: Italian—primavera, French—printemps, Dutch—voorjaar. Wisdom can be seen in this older way of looking at the yearly cycle, and instead of arbitrarily naming January 1 as the first day of the year, astrologers and other more traditionally minded thinkers prefer to consider the spring equinox, March 21, as the first day.

The days that comprise the Pisces-Aries cusp reveal not only the uncomplicated, fiery forwardness expected of Aries but also watery Piscean traits of dreaminess, active fantasy, quietude and sensitivity.

Those born on the Pisces-Aries cusp are unusually direct in their approach to life, and their outspokenness can make them alternately admired or misunderstood. Born on this primal cusp, they are basic, elemental individuals. The puzzling thing about Pisces-Aries is that although they themselves think that they see things in a simple and unclouded way, those who know them well often describe them as unrealistic dreamers, unable to get a handle on the harsh realities of the world. These individuals outwardly present a dynamic directness that often belies a sensitive, emotionally complex, even troubled inner life. Thus they are doers as well as dreamers and have a no-nonsense, "what you see is what you get" attitude that actually tells only part of the story.

Misunderstandings about them abound. Out of the purest motives possible, for example, a Pisces-Aries may make a generous offer, perhaps of time or money. Yet before you know it, he or she is being accused of acting holier-than-thou, or of behaving condescendingly when those on the receiving end feel resentment. Meanwhile, the Pisces-Aries feels bewildered and hurt.

Such scenarios are not uncommon in the lives of those born on the Pisces-Aries cusp. As a matter of fact, the more simply and directly they behave, the more others misread their intentions.

This directness of Pisces-Aries people inevitably arouses antagonism. However, those who are unwise enough to oppose them directly will quickly regret it. In addition, because of their quickness in grasping concepts and, often, in implementing their intuitive hunches, Pisces-Aries people may encounter resistance from those who move more slowly. Such a response has little effect on them, only arousing their impatience. Thus, particularly in group endeavors they must learn to curb their impetuosity, to listen to the often helpful suggestions of others, to slow their tempo and come into synch with the group rhythm. Ultimately, they must learn to weigh alternatives carefully before speaking or acting. Once they accomplish this, their logic can be remarkably persuasive and their thoroughness compelling.

Although their effect on people should teach them that something about their own behavior is amiss, Pisces-Aries generally refuse to change. They cannot really see any fault in what they do since, in their view, they are acting out of pure intentions. In the end, they often do get their way, whether by forging ahead without letup or by just sticking to their guns until the other party gives in.

Dealing with failure can be particularly difficult for those born on the Cusp of Rebirth. Since outright failure is not really in their vocabulary, when confronted with unavoidable defeat they are often baffled and bewildered. But their defense mechanisms in this respect are superb, and they are often spared defeat simply by their refusal to recognize it. They are not usually so unrealistic as to mistake losing for winning, but they do often view losing as just a partial setback on the way to a victory only temporarily postponed.

Others can learn, however, how to deal with Pisces-Aries successfully. One of the main rules is not to dig too deeply into their motives or to urge them to explain themselves. Another is not to try to analyze their personalities, or even to push them toward self-analysis. Yet those who use example rather than precept in encouraging them gently to be more objective about themselves can meet with success. This is not to say that Pisces-Aries can't learn from their own mistakes, simply that they must from time to time be encouraged to do so.

Another, even simpler route to getting along with Pisces-Aries is just to do what they say, at least for the time being. If you can come up with a better idea later, they will be prepared to listen, but rarely if ever in their first burst of enthusiasm. It is important to recognize how important impulses, hunches, and first actions are to Pisces-Aries people. Blunting or negating their intuitions with advice and alternative suggestions can easily alienate them forever. Rarely, however, will anyone succeed in breaking their spirit or damping their forward movement for long.

In relationships, Pisces-Aries can be faithful partners, although their faithfulness may be more emotional than literal. They can love deeply and passionately, in other words, giving a great deal of attention to their love object, but at the same time they are not always monogamous; their intuitive, fiery side is always vulnerable to some exciting new prospect that suddenly appears. Their partner is generally the one expected to play the more stable, long-suffering role. Not that they themselves demand monogamy from their mate; actually, in many cases, a relationship that is more open on both sides suits them better, since it allays any guilt they might feel about their own indiscretions.

Pisces-Aries people generally function better as parents than they did as children, feeling more loyalty and responsibility to their offspring than they did to their elders when they were younger. Family can have surprisingly strong meaning for these highly independent souls, but family in the larger sense, including friends and associates as well as kin.

PISCES - ARIES CUSP NOTABLES

How fitting that the spring equinox, the beginning of the astrological year, should be the birthday of Johann Sebastian Bach. Viewed by many as the ultimate source of classical music, Bach combined the many strands of earlier Renaissance and Baroque music and also created new and highly original forms. The German Bach family included many professional musicians from the 16th to the 18th centuries. The family name means “brook” and symbolically suggests neverending movement, clear and flowing from a pure source. The deeply religious Piscean element and the dynamic Aries drive are mixed in Bach’s music, which is highly complex structurally yet simple in its appeal.

Brooklynite Spike Lee burst onto the film scene after his graduation from NYU Film School. Like others born on the Pisces-Aries cusp, Lee has been both a dreamer and a doer, often misunderstood. He has done more than any other director to present the modern African-American experience in an uncompromising fashion. In Do the Right Thing and Malcolm X, Lee’s unique mix of politics and history promoted a more aware spirit in American cinema. His films aim for clarity with sharp and uncompromising accents, revealing an underlying sensitivity, which are all characteristic of those born on the Cusp of Rebirth.

SPIKE LEE

Achieving fame in the film The Piano, Holly Hunter conveys an image and presence far beyond her diminutive size. She typifies an indomitable spirit and refusal to be slowed down that are characteristic of those born on the Pisces-Aries cusp. Chameleonlike, she is able to play a wide variety of roles with apparent ease, emphasizing her Piscean side, and to uncompromisingly project her direct and piercing energies, an Aries trait. She can also portray a character who acts straightforward but is hard to read, typical traits of those born on the Cusp of Rebirth. Few birth images in film match that of Holly in The Piano, when she frees herself under water from her parlor grand and rises to the surface to be reborn.

ARIES I

The Week of the Child

March 25–April 2

The Aries I period takes The Child as its central image, and, because it can be likened to the earliest portion of a human life, its characteristics are typically those of wonder, awe, simplicity, curiosity and primal energy.

The days that comprise Aries I symbolically reveal the first explorations of a new person contacting the fresh and curious world around it. Each Aries I day illustrates another facet of The Child's makeup and shows that, though this newly emerged being is filled with wonder and awed by a bewildering complexity of sensory experience, it is tough and strong enough to survive. Aries I reveals the human dichotomy of a child's being able to absorb impressions and become part of its environment while at the same time preserving its own individual selfhood.

Because Aries I's show the frank and open demeanor of the child, they are sometimes accused of having a naive or superficial view of life. But the so-called naiveté that they project is only one manifestation of the awe and wonder they experience in response to the world around them, which they are constantly rediscovering. An intense need to express this wonder, and to share their observations with others, is also characteristic. Like children, they not only exhibit spontaneity and liveliness themselves but also appreciate these qualities in others. In fact, many may not understand how deep their need for direct expression really is.

As children, Aries I's are faithful, on their own terms, but not particularly dutiful, particularly when it comes to fulfilling the expectations of parents who project their own dreams and wishes on them. Although born in the Week of the Child, young Aries I's often give an impression of independence, as if they didn't need parents at all, but this conceals subtle emotional dependencies and needs that can manifest in small ways. Rarely will an Aries I child make a great show of feelings toward parents, preferring instead to express such emotion in the form of thoughtful everyday deeds. Parents of Aries I's quickly learn not to make the mistake of babying them, particularly as adolescents. Aries I's also dislike being reminded of their childlike demeanor when older, for it is vitally important to them that others regard them as mature and responsible.

The less outgoing Aries I's give the impression of being thoughtful, serious individuals, and even gregarious and talkative Aries I's tend to lead a highly private personal life. They have a quiet world to which they must retreat at frequent intervals, and it is inviolable. Often, an enclosed, even isolated existence has been forced on them in childhood through repeated criticism or misunderstanding, even that of parents who love and protect them. The danger of this is that as adolescents and mature adults they can fall into periods of brooding or depression, from which it may be difficult for them to work free. Moreover, Aries I people are slow to seek psychological help, preferring to handle their emotional difficulties by themselves.

Although Aries I's tend to spend long periods alone when away from work, their careers inevitably involve group or team endeavors. They have strong organizational energies, and others naturally come to depend on them. Rarely dictatorial, they even avoid being elected a group's leader, preferring instead to occupy an important role right in the center of things.

“CHILD”

The morality of Aries I's is usually fixed and will not allow them to act in ways that they see as underhanded. This inflexibility, reflecting both their strong beliefs and their idealism, can cause problems at times; if their ethical belief in what they are doing is strong enough, in fact, they will not hesitate to go against the established order of things, even to the point of committing actions that may be illegal in their society's eyes.

The behavior of Aries I's is usually a mixture of lively and highly measured responses. They are capable of swinging quickly from spontaneity to thoughtfulness, depending on the situation. Those involved with Aries I's must be sensitive to their moods or risk seeing them fly off the handle, usually as a result of feeling that they have been misread or misunderstood. Although some Aries I's can explode in anger, their more characteristic response is to turn heel and quickly leave the room. As those who are close to them will attest, however, Aries I's are usually agreeable to serious discussion of the problems of a given situation, as long as the conversation does not turn personal.

Aries I's demand a lot of understanding from their mates and friends. Those best suited for intimate relationships with these energetic individuals are willing to leave them the freedom to act and to be themselves, without attempting to place restrictions on them. The person perhaps best suited for an Aries I is down to earth, and has a good sense of humor, the ability to put things in perspective, and a life of his or her own. As far as friendships are concerned, Aries I's are dependable up to a point, that point usually arriving when they begin to feel that they are being taken advantage of. Again, those sensitive to their needs will protect the relationship's longevity by avoiding pushing them to that point. In any kind of relationship with Aries I's, knowing when to back off is essential. Confrontation should only be attempted with great care and sensitivity.

Generally speaking, a stable family life, including children, may not be the best prospect for Aries I's as young adults: they are better suited to this kind of life when they are older and have sown their wild oats. Their love relationships tend to the unusual, to say the least: they can be extremely unrealistic in their choice of partners, and their relationships may at times be suffused with a fairy-tale quality.

Aries I's rarely respond to societal pressures to have a recognized love object, much preferring abstinence to maintaining pro forma relations with a spouse, lover or fiancé.

Extramarital affairs are not at all uncommon for Aries I's, who may not see such actions as transgressions. Such relationships underline their curiosity and their need for adventure, while at the same time announcing their refusal to be bound by society's conventional strictures. An unconventional Aries I relationship can easily be carried on for years. Oddly enough, it is precisely in these areas that the most noble, moral and loyal sentiments of an Aries I may be expressed.

Actor-director Leonard Nimoy is best known as the pointy-eared character Spock in the Star Trek tv series and films. His appeal to young and old alike is unmistakable, but his youthful appeal to childhood fantasy is one of his most endearing traits. Nimoy conveys an openness and innocence characteristic of an Aries I, as in his role in The Invasion of the Body Snatchers, but also a feeling that he hides a very private life both on and off the screen, typical of those born in this week. Those who attempt to probe the depths of the Aries I personality or seek ulterior motives may be in for a rude surprise, because with either Spock or Nimoy, what you see is what you get.

Rock & roll's Aretha Franklin, mother of 4, has an exciting and direct singing style that betrays a certain childlike quality, perhaps because she has retained the openness and enthusiasm she manifested while growing up singing gospel music in her father's Detroit Baptist church. Few, if any, people have been strong enough to hold back the extremely independent Aretha for very long or so foolhardy to attempt to deprive her of her freedom. Her Grammy Legend Award and induction into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame are indications of the determination and dynamism that characterize those born in the Week of the Child.

ARETHA FRANKLIN

Environmental advocate Albert Gore, Jr., possibly one of the "greenest" vice presidents in U.S. history, represents the Clinton administration worldwide on a variety of crucial issues. Born and bred in Carthage, Tenn., Gore owns a small farm there, emphasizing the important link to childhood felt by many Aries I's. Gore's frank and open demeanor and his dislike of complication and subterfuge and of being analyzed are also marks of one born in the Week of the Child. His youthfulness, along with that of the president, was instrumental in their 1992 election as the first post-WWII-born duo to head the nation. Gore spoke with obvious pride when presenting the very new and up-to-date Information Superhighway to the public.

ARIES II

The Week of the Star

April 3–10

The Aries II period takes The Star as its central image. It can be likened to the time when a child first emerges from its protected, nurturing environment—not only to become more aware of life around it but perhaps also to feel itself at the center of what is going on.

The days that comprise Aries II reveal a period characterized by experimental, initiatory and social concerns. In human terms, this “Star” of childhood is a shining enthusiastic entity busy with its first attempt at self-definition, around which other figures revolve. The child develops a concept of self (ego formation) and refers to itself, first using its own name and only later using the word and concept “I.” Only by constant experimentation can its environment be probed and understood; this process involves a certain amount of daring and of necessity going too far or too fast at times. Indeed, the natural assertiveness of the child must be made manifest in order for normal development to take place.

Aries II people need to be at the center of things. They often feel lonely, even in the midst of a crowd, and consequently they rarely allow themselves to be alone. Born in the Week of the Star, they must have satellite planets revolving around them: admirers, supporters or co-workers. These individuals may seem self-centered, but even as they insist that their central position not be jeopardized or threatened, many are able to let go of their ego to a surprising degree by giving themselves fully to a project, cause, movement or religion. Aries II's can be swept away by their own vanity, and this can be unpleasant for those around them. Unfortunately, however, it is an ever-present pitfall for them that they fall in love with their own ideas, projects and even, in extreme cases, with themselves.

Those born during the Aries II period are highly goal oriented. Unfortunately, in order to get where they need to be, they may occasionally act amorally, and may neglect the feelings of others. This is probably not particularly painful for Aries II's themselves, since they don't generally rank high in empathy for or even in awareness of the emotions of others. Furthermore, their external striving can take the spotlight away from what should take center stage: their own inner being. Lack of introspection, simply not knowing themselves well, can hold these individuals back from spiritual growth. On the other hand, Aries II's who are challenged to realize that this inner peak is the one most worthy of being climbed are indeed fortunate people. Climbing it may well be the most important experience of their lives.

When it comes to a competitive, will-to-win kind of spirit, Aries II's have few equals. The upside of this driving energy is the ability to implement their often visionary and courageous ideals; the downside is an impatience with slower-moving minds and bodies, an irritability that can easily explode in destructive anger. Indeed, extreme behavior and a tendency to excess—basically not knowing when to stop—can land Aries II's in hot water again and again. This type of Aries must be particularly wary of letting their fire get out of control, and so must those who provoke them. Outright suppression or repression of their feelings is certainly not the answer, however, since this invariably results in frustration and depression, which can then initiate a new cycle.

On the other hand, Aries II's who remain balanced and relaxed and who keep their energy freely flowing are certainly individuals to be admired.

Transforming their abundant energy into hard work is often the solution sought by Aries II's. Consequently, one real way to relate to them is to get right in there with them, to work side by side with them and share their frustrations and joys. Those who can keep up with them often make successful partners and mates for them, although the prodigious energy required passes beyond the usual bounds of friendship.

Aries II's often put themselves into indispensable positions; they are highly dependent on the feeling that others need them. This is ironic, since at heart they like nothing better than being free to act, to move, to decide, without the encumbrance of familial or societal responsibilities. A time comes in the lives of many Aries II's when they are rejected or ignored by their fans and are thrown back on themselves. When painful experiences like this make them finally face and overcome their need to be needed, they may be pushed into discovering their essential self. It is not at all unlikely for Aries II's to show their truly independent side much later in life, perhaps even in their sixties and seventies, when they may travel, exercise, explore creative activities or hobbies or in other ways strike out on their own.

Is it possible for Aries II's to find emotional fulfillment in a relationship? What about those who become involved with them—what can they expect? Certainly not many days off; being involved with an Aries II can be a full-time job.

Yet those who relate to them most successfully are often put in the role of friend or advisor first, mate or lover second. The love relationships of Aries II's often burn out quickly, like shooting stars. Their selfish drives to conquer and dominate, unfortunately, come out in passionate relationships; quick to get involved, they can just as quickly get uninvolved.

Those who seek to touch an Aries II person on a direct emotional level may find themselves rebuffed. Aries II's have a real problem opening up at a deep level. They rarely let others into their inner world, and, indeed, it sometimes seems that they deny access to their emotional life even to themselves. Given their air of aloofness or detachment, emotional types often feel rejected by them. Nevertheless, they do have a need for a sympathetic and understanding mate or close friend who can help them understand themselves better. Those who are best for them are those who hang in there, not only exerting great patience and willpower but encouraging them to express and discuss their feelings. Finally, despite their aloofness, jealousy is not uncommon among Aries II's; to be replaced as the object of someone's affections is not at all what they have in mind for themselves.

Marlon Brando, whose star has blazed brightly across Hollywood's heavens, began as the quintessential 50s rebel. From On the Waterfront and A Streetcar Named Desire to The Godfather, Last Tango in Paris, and Apocalypse Now, Brando established his own acting style, with a bit of help from Lee Strasberg and method acting. Born in the Week of the Star, Brando has little choice but to be the center of attention and in the middle of whatever is going on. He has had his share of problems, but his tremendous willpower has largely been his to summon whenever it is needed. Characteristic of an Aries II is Brando's penchant for excess and his tendency to land in hot water when events get too far out of control.

Billie Holiday, one of the greatest of all jazz singers, was a prototype of the Aries II Star. Working with the finest musicians of her generation, notably the bands of Lester Young, Teddy Wilson, Count Basie and Artie Shaw, "Lady Day" was at her best singing with small groups in more intimate settings. Her personal life was in many ways a disaster, and she was worn down by alcohol and drugs. With a typical Aries II disinterest in self-analysis, she forced people to take her as she was. Compromise was not in Billie's vocabulary. Paradoxically, it is her older, more mature voice that many prefer today, even though it was diminished by her destructive lifestyle.

BILLIE HOLIDAY

Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen. Colin Powell was catapulted into the nation's political limelight in 1996, when some Republicans sought to make him the first African-American presidential candidate. Having shared honors with Gen. Norman Schwarzkopf for the victory in the Gulf War of 1991, Powell feels extremely comfortable at the center of command but is more of a team player who enjoys striving shoulder to shoulder with others and achieving concrete goals. His ability to balance his energies and hang loose in the saddle reflect the qualities of the most highly evolved Aries II's. Relaxed and confident, the modest and quiet Powell has become a beacon for the hopes and aspirations of many young African-Americans.

ARIES III

The Week of the Pioneer

April 11-18

The Aries III period takes The Pioneer as its central image. Symbolizing the further socialization of the child, it pictures a personality displaying humanity and taking an active interest in group activities. Along with cutting his/her first adult teeth, The Pioneer begins to come to grips with the vast repository of human culture through reading, writing and the media.

The days that comprise Aries III show a personality unfolding against the backdrop of social issues and activities. In The Grand Cycle of Life, the Aries III period occupies the time when a person demonstrates an interest in learning and begins the formal educational process. The spirit of exploration is strong here and accompanies the desire of the child to make its mark on its immediate environment and perhaps go beyond it. The Aries III period shows more group involvement than is traditional for the sign of Aries, anticipating the powerful social expression of the upcoming sign of Taurus.

Aries III's are quite uncharacteristic of the more self-centered, egoistic Aries types; much more social in nature, they must interact dynamically and regularly with their fellow humans, particularly with regard to bettering their living and working conditions. They are often true leaders, more concerned with doing good for their followers than with their own glory. Pioneers, they are often idealistic types who follow their visions fearlessly. Needless to say, they cannot exist side by side for long with another dominant personality, particularly one who challenges their authority. Such struggles may confuse or bewilder those born in this week, who believe that they are only acting for the good of all.

Aries III's sometimes fall victim to their own desire to help out. Because they often look to do good, and can be overly generous with their resources, these giving individuals can easily be taken advantage of. Guests invited to visit for a few days wind up staying for weeks, months or years. Small loans or donations to good causes may be granted with increasing frequency, turning into major financial support. A few minutes given each day to visit an invalid or to do volunteer work can lengthen to hours. Such largesse can put intolerable strain on the family of which the Aries III is a member.

Those born in the Week of the Pioneer may also choose the path of sacrifice, which their family or social group is usually expected to share. If their ideology calls for a certain type of health diet, say, or for a drastic reduction in the importance of food altogether, then so be it. Adult Aries III's can engender rebellious attitudes in their children or other young people under their sway, from whom they constantly demand sacrifice.

Both iconoclasts and traditionalists, Aries III's sometimes change roles when they move from one activity to another, or from one period of life to another. It is because they know the rules so well that they are able to break them. Their often high degree of creativity may express itself in the discovery, development or sale of useful products, particularly those that improve on methods used in the past.

Aries III's do not do well living alone, while going out into the world to work; yet neither can they give themselves easily to simple one-on-one conjugal relationships. They need to surround themselves daily with children, family and communal or social groups, which they invariably seek to infuse with their dynamic idealism.

Aries III's are passionate about more than just their ideas: sexual energy runs high in this group, and their mates and lovers may be kept busy in satisfying them or living up to their needs. (Nor will an Aries III usually hesitate to find satisfaction elsewhere if it is denied at home.) They will sometimes see having children as a way of creating their own following, and this view of parenthood demands an agreeable, understanding and capable mate. Such a partner will inevitably be called upon to shoulder enormous responsibilities, and without complaint.

In relationships, Aries III's principal problem is the habit of forcing their ideas on others, putting abstractions ahead of personal considerations. Their children can have special problems in this regard; those born in this week sometimes hurt children's feelings, either by overlooking them or by refusing to recognize them. Such attitudes can apply also to Aries III's mates, who may be left at home feeling neglected while their partners are off challenging the world. Should Aries III males choose to apply their ideas to their living space, their wives or lovers may come to feel completely disenfranchised and lost.

The protectiveness of Aries III's toward their friends and family is generally valuable as long as it does not smother, or run out of hand. Better on defense than offense, those born in this week know how to disable an unreasonable opponent effectively with only a few words, or even a swift physical counterattack, though their proficiency in the fine art of diplomacy usually forestalls such out-and-out confrontations. Indeed, the classic Aries III will see the storm clouds gathering miles off, and will prepare for them well in advance of their arrival.

Another problem for the intimates of Aries III's is that, although these individuals are usually ready to listen, and are generous with their energy for fixing things, they may be unable to express true sympathy or to empathize. Due to their intensely positive attitude they have little time for nagging or complaining. Such “negative” expressions, however, can be highly useful in a relationship for blowing off steam and, if denied, can result in a buildup of frustration. In their lack of sympathy for complaints, Aries III's may only be postponing a problem that may one day bring their partner to a depression, or a volcanic explosion of anger, or even, eventually, may end in the breakup of the relationship.

The benefits of involvement with an Aries III, on the other hand, can be great. They have much to teach, and since they do so by example, they leave little doubt about their honesty—they put it on the line each time. They also convey a nobility and a depth of conscience and commitment that are highly admirable. Finally, they are not solemn moralists but truly fun-loving people who revel in activities like cookouts, summer vacations, outings and parties of all sorts.

ADVICE:

Tune in to what people are really saying. Beware of those who wish to monopolize your time and energy. Ideals and ideas can be worthy of devotion, but also destructive. Make sure that others want to be helped or led before you offer. Try to keep in touch with the actual state of things. Beware of being carried away by your own enthusiasm.

ARIES III NOTABLES

The quintessential Renaissance man, Leonardo da Vinci was an accomplished painter, poet, inventor and expert in the areas of geology, anatomy, botany, mechanics, aeronautics and many other fields. Few who have seen his Mona Lisa or beautifully elaborate and technically correct drawings have attempted to deny his absolute mastery of realistic painting and drawing. His study of the human body and his attempts to make life more pleasurable for those around him mark Leonardo as an Aries III, more socially than selfishly oriented. His breakthrough, hallmark discoveries and inquisitive mind mark him as a true Pioneer. Leading others with ideas rather than commands, this truly universal thinker blazed a path to the pinnacle of human achievement.

Loretta Lynn, known by her signature song as the Coal Miner's Daughter, grew up real fast in Butcher Hollow, Kentucky. She was married at 13, a mother of 4 at 17 and a grandmother with 6 children by the age of 31. Her pioneering spirit was clearly in evidence when she became the first woman to have a country music album go gold. An Aries III to the core, Lynn taught herself music and then proceeded to march to the very top of her profession. In 1988 she became a member of the Country Music Hall of Fame.

LORETTA LYNN

Ideas and ideals, plus an innate sense of humanity and nobility in the face of adversity, clearly mark Charlie

Chaplin as an Aries III. Born in wretchedly poor circumstances and forced to watch his father die from alcoholism and his mother go insane, Chaplin fought his way out of London's gutters onto the Hollywood movie screen and into the hearts of moviegoers the world over. As the lovable Tramp, his moustache, baggy trousers, hat and cane were personal trademarks, and his social attitudes in Modern Times and The Great Dictator reveal him clearly as a Pioneer. Both his formation of United Artists Studios and persecution as a communist in the early 50s illustrate Chaplin's inability to stay removed from business and social controversy.

The Cusp of Power

The Aries-Taurus cusp is an admixture of the first sign of the zodiac, Aries, and the second sign of the zodiac, Taurus. This cusp can be symbolically likened to the period around seven years of age in the human life and falls at the beginning of mid-spring in the northern hemisphere. The Aries-Taurus cusp may be said to represent Power. During this period of the year the forces of nature are fully released with beautiful, sometimes terrifying, intensity. The onset of spring may be seen as heralding an idyllic, pastoral season but has also been the time of violent blood rituals both in primitive cultures and in the Christian Easter Jewish Passover celebrations. In spring, the melting snow of the mountains discharges torrents of water, rains come and colorful new life thrusts up through the earth seeking light and air. In humans, the age of seven usually marks the arrival of many of the second teeth, and the child passes over into a stage in which he/she begins to feel and express newfound powers. Ideally, identification with the parent of the same sex has occurred by now and the child seeks to assert his/her growing independence and autonomy.

The days that comprise the Aries-Taurus cusp reveal some of this manifestation of Power, not only in the fiery forwardness and willfulness expected of Aries, but also in earthy Taurus traits of practicality, endurance and nurturing.

Those born on the Aries-Taurus cusp strive for power in their daily lives, but their personalities temper and ground the fiery dynamism of Aries through the solidity and earthiness of Taurus. The undeniable trademark of those born in this week is a preoccupation with power. They see their birthright as nothing less than the very best that life has to offer. Yet they generally know how to pursue their goals without arousing antagonism in others. Powerfully persuasive, they make it easier and more advantageous to agree with them than to disagree. Whether it takes a long or a short time to achieve their ends matters little to Aries-Tauruses as long as they get there. Above all, they have a superb sense of timing, and of kairos—knowing the right time to act and not to act.

In first meetings, they often impress others as quiet and self-assured—as people who know how to watch and wait. Aries-Tauruses do not waste their time proving anything to anyone, preferring to hang back confidently and save their energy for when it counts. In this respect they make formidable enemies and capable co-workers. Their approach to work is highly professional, and those involved with them must understand that their career will always be at least as important to them as their relationships.

Those involved with Aries-Tauruses can benefit tremendously from their powerful presence and capabilities. They know the value of money, and also how to get it. Their goal, however, is usually not so much financial security as a steady cash flow that they derive from their work, and that permits them to spend freely. As they see it, financial dependency on someone else is a liability; they would just as soon do the supporting themselves, since they have little desire to give up their personal freedom. Learning to accept financial and other kinds of support from mates, family and friends may be difficult for them, but, like love, it will ultimately bring them a step forward in their personal development.

"POWER"

The unspoken secret of Aries-Taurus people is that what they secretly long for most is to give up the daily battles of the world and simply submit to fantasy, pleasure, perhaps to another individual, perhaps to sheer laziness. This is usually impossible for them to accomplish for very long, but in their hard-driving approach to daily life it is always a comforting thought, an idea that gets them through many a tough day. Certainly Aries-Tauruses do best when they can periodically empty themselves out (through sleep, for example, or leisure time, massage, meditation or vacations), allowing themselves to recharge.

In relationships, no matter how high or low their station, Aries-Tauruses make their presence felt in their interactions with others. They are big people, capable of prodigious mistakes as well as of glittering successes, and they leave little doubt about where they stand. They tend to choose rather than to be chosen. Once they have fixed their sights on someone the matter is settled. This is not to say that their judgment is perfect: they will quickly take credit when they have chosen well, but their inability to admit to a major mistake tends to make them very long-suffering. Aries-Tauruses hang in there not only because they are faithful but, more important, because to quit would be an admission of failure, and failure is very hard indeed for them to handle.

Those born on the Cusp of Power are extremely generous, but on their terms. They only give when it suits them, and they are equally capable of taking back not only their gifts but their affection—not out of capriciousness or malice, but because they feel that their gifts have gone unappreciated or were undeserved. Not infrequently, the degree of their giving can itself be intimidating, arousing insecurity in less robust souls. Such lavishness can create dependencies in both the giver and the recipient, and these may later be difficult or impossible to break.

An important lesson that Aries-Tauruses must learn is to give up a certain amount of their power, and to replace it with a degree of sharing, cooperation and acceptance. That they become more powerful, in a human sense, by doing so is a realization that will grow with the years. In this respect, a warm and giving mate or friend, and the mutual affection engendered through family life of some kind, are essential for their development.

A second lesson, related to the first, is that the greatest power may be the power of love. Whether sexual or affectionate, romantic, platonic or religious, love has an undeniable softening effect on those born on the Cusp of Power. Although they may take and discard lovers when it pleases them, they do best on a steady diet of love from one special person. They reach their zenith and shine most brightly when this love involves an unconditional giving on their part, which is perhaps the closest they can come to true selflessness.

ADVICE:

Try not to overpower others. Learn to back off and allow things to happen as they will. Although your hands may itch to do the job, give others a chance to do it their way, even if they make mistakes. Try to remain sensitive to the feelings of those around you.

ARIES - TAURUS CUSP NOTABLES

Leader of the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia, Vladimir Ilyich Lenin was a living embodiment of Power. Shipped from Germany in a sealed railway car, Lenin entered Russia's revolutionary bloodstream like a hidden virus, which then spread, multiplied and raged out of control. Lenin's mastery of the rules of power was soon evident, as his small political party gained and maintained control over the world's largest country. Lenin's plans for world revolution did not materialize, however, and only 3 years after he established the Third International, he was paralyzed by his first stroke, dying 2 years later in 1922. Interestingly, his Sagittarius-Capricorn successor, Joseph Stalin, and Aries-Taurus Adolf Hitler were also fire-earth combinations. (Aries and Sagittarius are fire signs, Taurus and Capricorn earth.)

QUEEN ELIZABETH II

Thought to be the wealthiest woman in the world, Queen Elizabeth II of Great Britain has quietly and firmly ruled her country for almost half a century. Although opposed by not inconsiderable forces that wish to scrap the monarchy and plagued by divorce and scandal within her own family, Elizabeth has managed to maintain an iron grip on many affairs of state. Although supposedly only a figurehead, this powerful monarch continues to exert economic and political influence on those who guide the destiny of her country. While the British Empire is no more, the queen still occupies a unique place in the hearts and minds of the majority of her subjects.

Brooklyn-born film director, producer, singer-songwriter, actress and musical comedy star Barbra Streisand has parlayed her talents into success with her guts, willpower and genius. Immensely ambitious, Streisand succeeded where many have failed. Throughout her tempestuous life, she has reigned over Hollywood and the Broadway stage with a power and resolve equaled by few others in her generation. She owes a great deal to her many fans, who have supported her unceasingly through thick and thin.

BARBRA STREISAND

Thanks to the special rapport she establishes with her audiences, she is revered like a goddess, who grants a glimpse of the heavens through her grace and strange beauty.

TAURUS I

The Week of Manifestation

April 25–May 2

The Taurus I period takes Manifestation as its central image. This period can be likened to the time in a child's life when real power can be exercised, often by giving concrete form to ideas and implementing them effectively. Learning to build physical structures and to set up workable systems is part of this manifestative process.

The days that comprise Taurus I symbolically reveal the elementary school-aged child developing an ever-evolving individual personality of his or her own within the larger structures of established institutions and society. Problems involving power struggles, diplomacy, autonomy, compromise, survival and defense arise on a daily basis and must be met. Out of this crucible character is formed.

Taurus I's are hard-headed pragmatists and those born in the Week of Manifestation are among the most dominant individuals of the year. When seized by an idea or plan, they will not let it rest until it is implemented. Rarely will this idea be one that has not already been proven, or does not show great promise; Taurus I's are convinced of most of their enterprises' success from the start.

Manifesting or giving shape to a concept might include setting up a home or family as well as a business or other organization. A feeling for structure, particularly of a hierarchical kind, comes naturally to Taurus I's. Technically oriented, they love to find out how and why things work, not hesitating to take them apart and put them back together again. This penchant for practical analysis applies to artistic and financial models as well as mechanical ones.

Sensation

Although the leadership abilities of Taurus I's are undeniable, it is less the kick of leading others that drives them than the vision of personally implementing their ideas through group endeavors. Taurus I's prefer sitting and ruling the roost to vying with others for power or seeking new worlds to conquer. Among the most stubborn of all Tauruses, they are impossible to convince of the need for change, unless you can demonstrate that they will gain an unequivocal advantage by modifying their plans.

As bosses but also as co-workers, Taurus I's can be highly successful through their diplomacy and their understanding of their colleagues' needs. Their role at work often mirrors that at home: they are protectors and nurturers. The Taurus I boss stresses employees' need to get along with each other and to work as a team. Taurus I's are not always psychologically prepared for infighting, or for situations in which they are ignored, belittled or unappreciated. They are quite capable of getting rid of troublemakers but may also withdraw, or even fall into a depressive slump. In the same way, they become bewildered and confused when their generosity in personal relationships goes unappreciated. This works against their ability to implement their ideas. Learning not to take things personally, and particularly not to feel let down or betrayed when people disagree with them, will increase their effectiveness.

Taurus I's are intensely physical people; sex, food, comfort, and sports and recreation of all kinds are important to their mental and physical well-being. One way to get close to them is to share a daily regimen with them, perhaps jogging, swimming, squash or tennis. This kind of activity will help build a bond of mutual trust, allowing them to open their hearts and share their secrets. Taurus I's usually know when to stop in the area of physical endeavor, but overindulgence in sedentary pleasures can be damaging and dangerous to them. Often passionately interested in food, they can have major problems with overweight, alcohol, high cholesterol and related physical disorders.

Taurus I's can avoid many problems by adjusting their self-image to correspond more with reality. What they think they are (tough, no-nonsense, stable) and what they really are (sensitive, emotional, tending to exaggerate) are too often at variance. Unfooled by their cool, often gruff exterior, those who know them well know how emotionally vulnerable they are, and instinctively seek to protect them. In business and social affairs, Taurus I's can easily be knocked off-balance, particularly when they put on a big act for the benefit of others, who may perceive them as blowhards. Sticking to the issues, being themselves, and avoiding personal involvements are essential for their relations with fellow employees. Above all, Taurus I's should avoid trying to show how generous and big-hearted they are; they should learn to let their actions speak for themselves. Smugness and a know-it-all attitude only arouse resentments that can backfire later.

In relationships with Taurus I's, head-on confrontations should be avoided. A much more sensible method, particularly when they are your parents or mates, is to appeal to their need for affection and harmony. Emotional manipulation or appeal, particularly at moments of good feeling, is likely to work better than knock-down, drag-out argument. Since Taurus I's like to run the show, shouldering huge burdens all day at work, they may feel that the relief of the peaceful home environment is worth protecting at all costs.

Of course, this peace can have its downside: Taurus I's can be so happy with their living situation that they ignore its warning signs. Prone to procrastination, those born in this week often downplay matters needing attention, whether a squeaky door, a drafty window or the needs of a family member. The desire of Taurus I's for peace and quiet, and their resistance to change, can become oppressive, even stifling, to those who live with them.

In general, Taurus I's tend to preserve and hold on to what they've got. At some point in their lives, however, they may have to learn to walk away from a relationship instead of trying to hold it together or patch it up: if it falls apart, something better may emerge. Should they fail to learn this, their inability to let go may leave both them and their partners in limbo. Their conviction that problems may get better, or may go away, only makes painful issues harder to deal with. Such avoidance may lead both parties to feel trapped: unable to work things out yet unable to leave.

TAURUS I NOTABLES

Czech-Austrian industrialist and businessman Oskar Schindler saved over 1,000 Jews from the Nazi death camps. With the stubbornness and pragmatic viewpoint only a Taurus I could exhibit, Schindler refused to let "his Jews" be taken away from their jobs in his factory.

OSKAR SCHINDLER

Stubbornly arguing that they were aiding the war effort, Nazi Party member Schindler succeeded in tricking German officials, particularly when he courageously entered the concentration camps himself to get his workers back. Immortalized in Steven Spielberg's film Schindler's List, most people had never heard of the man before Spielberg brought him to prominence. Dedication to manifesting their ideas in cold, hard reality characterizes Taurus I's like Schindler.

The stunning good looks of actress Michelle Pfeiffer are characteristic of the Taurus I kind of Venusian beauty. Pfeiffer has managed to bowl people over with her overwhelming goddesslike demeanor and acting skills. Choosing to adopt a baby girl and raise her as a single mother demonstrates Taurus I determination to carry through on an idea and assume responsibility for the welfare of another. Forty years old in 1997, Pfeiffer has never looked better and will undoubtedly continue to maintain her radiant appearance in typical Taurus I style.

MICHELLE PFEIFFER

Outstanding composer, arranger and pianist Duke Ellington succeeded in bringing a new sophistication to jazz. Associations with Igor Stravinsky and Billy Strayhorn showed Ellington as a master of the jazz ensemble. Highly individual in its approach, the Ellington band did not aim for the hard-swinging quality of Count Basie, the excitement of Benny Goodman or the commercialism of Glenn Miller, but took the high ground in putting Ellington's artistic concepts to work, much to the delight of creatively oriented audiences the world over. The Duke was a master of Manifestation, with his band, compositions, arrangements, performances and recordings being proof of his ability to bring his ideas to fruition.

TAURUS II

The Week of the Teacher

May 3–10

The Taurus II period takes The Teacher as its central image. This period can be likened to the time in a child's life when formal learning and education have taken a central role. Study becomes the basis for a future time in which the young adult will take his/her place in society.

The days that comprise Taurus II reveal the development of this formal learning process and stress the importance of the teacher as a role model. Devotion, awakening, moral development and independent action are all important elements here. Also, the child at this stage of life discovers how this personal orientation fits in with the larger scheme of things, particularly with regard to other subcultures and nationalities. Ultimately, the student develops the capability to teach or transmit what he/she has learned to others.

Those people born in the Week of the Teacher are mainly involved in the development of ideas and techniques. No matter what the vocation or avocation of a Taurus II, they have a message to share. Verbalizing their ideas and observations, generating discussion, and leading by example are all Taurus II's favorite activities. It can be said that they have a calling for imparting information and, more importantly, presenting it in a manner that others can understand.

It is not surprising that Taurus II's have a strong need for teacher-student-type interactions. They intuitively sense that teacher and student are two sides of the same coin, and that this coin is one they wish to invest in their future. Taurus II's generally do well enough at school, but fare best as students or teachers in one-on-one learning or small group situations such as in dance, music, sports and the visual arts. For a Taurus II, being a good student is the first step toward becoming a good teacher. Taurus II teachers also know the value of learning on one's own and, instead of binding students to them, will encourage them to teach themselves.

Those born in the Taurus II period are movers and shakers, and, since they rarely deal with flighty or superficial topics, they are capable of influencing others. Part of the key to this lies in the fact that Taurus II's live so much of their lives in the realm of ideas, of ideologies. Excellent entrepreneurs, they can set up both businesses and families without an excessive need to dominate or impose an inflexible structure on those with whom they live and work. They do, however, often establish lines that should not be crossed.

Taurus II's are very interested in the living conditions of those around them, and particularly in social groups that are foreign to them. How and where others live, work, play, eat, worship, vote and exercise has enormous fascination for Taurus II's, who also tend side with the underdog and to feel all forms of unfairness and discrimination keenly. Not surprisingly, interracial or cross-cultural relationships are common for Taurus II's. Similarly, older Taurus II's may be attracted to younger people and younger Taurus II's to those much older than themselves.

The moral stance of the Taurus II is usually strong, even unyielding. They have firm ideas about right and wrong, which they do not hesitate to express. Although you probably wouldn't call them straitlaced, they may exhibit prudish or even puritanical tendencies, particularly when young. And such early tendencies, even though outgrown, may surface in times of stress when they are adults, much to the surprise of those who know them as free-thinkers. The area in which the ethical orientation of Taurus II's is most unequivocal is their insistence on fairness. One might say, in fact, that they are obsessed with injustice, prejudice and discrimination in all forms. Their reaction to any form of racism is scathing, uncompromising and immediate. Actually, anger may erupt suddenly in almost any area of the lives of Taurus II's, and those born in this week must learn how to handle their feelings of upset healthily, while not suppressing them.

Physical activity, whether sports, dance, music, or fitness training, comes naturally to Taurus II's, yet they do not convey the impression of being earthy, sensuous types. They generally create a strong first impression, and make a heavy impact on their environment, but this may be due more to their mental qualities than to their physical ones. Even those of a small or average body type often project an image far greater than their actual size on first meeting.

Although excellent bosses, parents and teachers, Taurus II's are not always the easiest people to be involved with day-to-day as mate, lover or friend. Demanding and critical, those born in this week make their dislikes known sharply and incisively, often alienating or insulting those of a softer or more sensitive disposition. Their insistence that people be hard and tough, able to take the truth in a straight dose, is not everyone's cup of tea. When

Taurus II's become happier and more comfortable with themselves, and as they grow older, many of their critical characteristics will mellow or even disappear.

With their Venusian love of beauty and their great charm and personal magnetism, Taurus II's often have a host of admirers. They are not really comfortable with a great deal of attention, however, and do not like finding themselves imprisoned in a social circle of their own making. At such times those born in this period have little choice but to withdraw into a more isolated existence. More successful Taurus II's therefore learn to control their own attractive powers and to create fewer problems for themselves.

Those who relate best to Taurus II's in personal relationships are those who understand their need to be left alone rather than being fussed over or spoiled. Taurus

II's prefer their mates to show their enthusiasm for the relationship simply by upholding their share of it rather than by displays of gratitude or affection. In intimate situations, Taurus II's can be extremely passionate, but in their everyday routine they insist on a certain distance. They prefer romance to sentimentality, but like a realistic and frank approach to love and sex even better. They do not generally react well to others' requests for attention or affection, even when those others are intimates; anything that looks like pleading or begging usually turns them off completely. Taurus II's like their partners to be strong and dignified above all.

TAURUS II NOTABLES

The didactic quality of actor-director Orson Welles squarely marks him as a Teacher. The innovations in his first film, Citizen Kane, pointed the way for future filmmakers as no other film before. Whether he spoke as an actor, director or simply creative genius, Welles was a master of the telling observation and of witty repartee and sarcasm. Interested in ideas for their own sake, Welles was a true intellectual, but at the same time he had the contempt for second-rate ideas or phoniness that all experts possess. The problem with all this is that Welles was an amateur magician and conjurer himself, so that despite his brilliance people were not always prepared to believe him. Nevertheless, he displayed a mastery of language as evidenced by his storytelling on film.

The tumultuous life and times of Eva Perón are known to many, due to Andrew Lloyd Webber's musical Evita and the song Don't Cry for Me, Argentina. She was the illegitimate child of a mother who sought to control through men, and such a role model influenced Evita in choosing a string of lovers who could advance her career. As the wife of Argentine dictator Juan Perón, she became the heroine of the working class and, characteristic of many Taurus II's, the protector and champion of the poor and disadvantaged. Indeed, through Perón, she succeeded in making inroads in improving the living conditions of Argentina's workers. Uncompromising, she refused to give up her moral struggle when confronted by the military. Possessed of a characteristic Taurus II temper, she was said to be her own worst enemy when out of control.

EVA PERÓN

SIGMUND FREUD

Founder of psychoanalysis, and the first modern psychologist, Sigmund Freud is considered one of the pioneers of 20th-century thought. His written works and lectures mark him clearly as a Teacher, particularly in the areas of the unconscious, dream interpretation and clinical psychiatric treatment. But he is also characteristic of the rigidity and dogmatism of Taurus II's and their refusal to admit mistakes. Many of his original observations have been discredited because they were based on a relatively small group of patients, but the universal truth of his more important concepts, particularly his emphasis on parent-child interactions in the first years of life, have generally been upheld.

TAURUS III

The Week of the Natural

The Taurus III period takes The Natural as its central image. This period can be likened to the time when a fast-maturing child establishes a relationship with society but also wishes to be him/herself without undue societal demands. The onset of puberty means having to accept new sexual changes that are taking place and attempting to develop a more mature attitude, free of shame or stigma.

The days that comprise Taurus III reveal the tremendous release of energy that accompanies late childhood. These changes are not only physical but occur in the fantasy and unconscious world as well. Attraction, inhibition and lack of it, rebellion, mischievousness and acting out of unconscious wishes all play their part in this activity. Saying goodbye to childhood may indeed be a painful process, and many children feel the need to withdraw when they are so boldly thrust into the world by their natural drives and development. In the Taurus III period the normally more static nature of Taurus becomes increasingly dynamic, even impulsive, anticipating the energy of the upcoming sign of Gemini.

Taurus III's are highly sensitive individuals who need to be left free to express themselves as directly and naturally as they wish. Taurus III's do not react well when others try to correct, reform or change their basic habits. These spontaneous, fun-loving, zany individuals insist on being themselves: indeed, they seem to have no other choice. Yet society can put pressures on an individual to conform, and Taurus III's may consequently encounter serious frustrations and obstacles while growing up. Nervousness and neurotic behavior not infrequently result and, in more extreme cases, depressions and acutely repressed feelings.

A Taurus III child, like many Taurus III adults, is generally fun-loving and imaginative, full of fantastic thoughts and colorful behavior. These individuals are drawn throughout their lives to the natural world, in part due to the freedom it represents. In childhood, problems may arise when a parent, sibling, family member or teacher lacks sympathy for their "wayward" behavior and attempts to straighten it out. Those born in the Week of the Natural often lack the toughness to resist strong criticism, and they can be deeply hurt by a lack of understanding from those close to them. In the long run, however, they may also benefit from any resistance to them, becoming stronger and more capable of dealing with a hostile and critical environment. Leaving home and getting out on their own come early in the life of a Taurus III, and even those who seem docile and content often secretly yearn for the time when they can exert their independence. As they grow up, most Taurus III's succeed in finding friends who appreciate them, and rarely will Taurus III's carry hurtful or revengeful thoughts against childhood adversaries into adulthood. However, they may well retain some scars from childhood battles that, if repressed, can lead to sudden and baffling depressions or emotional outbursts.

It is hard for Taurus III's to keep a low profile. Craving action and excitement, and often unable to keep their strong opinions on those around them to themselves, they can easily get into hot water. Taurus III's can be very emotionally volatile, and easily bored, qualities that invariably lead to many changes of friends, lovers and generally of their entire scene. An eternal fascination with the oddball, unusual aspects of life will always threaten to remove them from steadier and more stable situations and individuals. On the other hand, their instability can make them crave the grounding influence of people, places and professions, and for varying periods of time they may doggedly hold on, knowing that to let go could result in aimlessness and lack of direction.

This duality between a natural impulsiveness and a need for stability (often a result of a fear of their own unsettledness) can be the key factor in all of the adult relationships of Taurus III's. Although insecurities abound in their personalities, these can act as a powerful fuel for their drive to succeed in life, rise in their jobs and break through societal barriers. In this sense, paradoxically, their dynamism can itself become a stabilizing force, and their ambition both a rock they can hold to and a compass pointing the way. Thus many born in this week who might have been satisfied with an enjoyable, unstressed, easy-going life, and better suited to it as well, are driven upward by their own quest for security, frequently a goal involving financial independence. Taurus III's are, above all, people who create their own challenges.

Although one would imagine that adventure, sex, drugs and all forms of wild behavior would exert a powerful pull on Taurus III's (as they inevitably do at some point in these individuals' lives), those born in this week are not invariably prone to lifelong obsessions and addictions. They are supported not so much by their good sense as by an understanding of the basic nature of these areas of behavior, and this kind of kinship or familiarity allows them to navigate perilous channels without foundering on the rocks.

In relationships, rebelliousness against authority can haunt Taurus III's their whole life long. Those who enter into relationships with them, moreover, particularly their mates and lovers, risk coming to symbolize for them the repressive forces that those born in the Week of the Natural cannot abide. It is essential, then, to be understanding of the battles being waged in the psyche of a Taurus III, while at the same time refusing to become a football or emotional punching bag. Difficulties may particularly surface when Taurus III's want others to take them seriously—their combination of fantastic ideas and unpredictable behavior is not always conducive to inspiring trust, and they may have to battle long and hard before their ideas are accepted. Still, as with their drive to financial success, fighting over issues like these can give them direction and security. Successful Taurus III's are those who are able to give form to their fantasy, to embody it in a product, service or artistic activity. Such individuals can strike deep responsive chords in the imaginations of their fellows, who may feel they live in a more humdrum world from which they secretly crave release. In the same way, Taurus III's may draw others to them as friends and lovers.

TAURUS III NOTABLES

Dennis Hopper has been called many things—pretentious, swaggering, wild man, madman—but rarely has anyone implied that Hopper is anything but himself. His antiestablishment and manic edge has kept moviegoers on the edge of their seats from his appearances in Rebel Without A Cause and Easy Rider (which he directed) to Blue Velvet and Waterworld. Always on the outside, Hopper has followed his fantasy like few others and has often succeeded in pulling audiences after him. Although his private life has been strung out at times, he has often straightened it out. Perhaps expanding our view of the natural to include the unnatural has been his single most constant preoccupation.

With Ruth St. Denis and Isadora Duncan, the “mothers” of modern dance in America, Martha Graham succeeded in creating a distinctly American choreography. Legendary for having danced into her 80s and 90s, Graham brought a new, natural approach to dance. Rather than draw from the stylized postures of the past, she reached into the world of nature for her inspiration and uncovered organic and timeless forms that she brought to light on the stage. Although dynamic, her static poses may be her most characteristic and memorable. Aaron Copland’s Appalachian Spring was one of her greatest vehicles and clearly displayed her strong American roots.

MARTHA GRAHAM

Spanish artist Salvador Dalí, largely self-taught, was fascinated by the oddball and unusual. He became the supreme embodiment of those qualities himself and expressed his outrageousness in both his life and his art. Yet to imagine him as a wide-eyed dreamer is far from the truth. Dalí was a technical genius in every sense of the term, shown in documentaries before the camera’s watchful eye transforming the most simple materials into dazzling works of art in only a few seconds or minutes. Dalí was also a traditionalist, a student of the past who built his career on earlier discoveries. His irreverence for present-day authority, however, was undeniable, and his ability to be mischievous, play pranks or be outright offensive was unparalleled.

TAURUS-GEMINI CUSP

The Cusp of Energy

May 19–24

The Taurus-Gemini cusp is an admixture of the second sign of the zodiac, Taurus, and the third sign of the zodiac, Gemini. This cusp may be symbolically likened to the period around fourteen years of age in the human life and falls at the beginning of late spring in the northern hemisphere. The Taurus-Gemini cusp may be said to represent Energy. During this period of the year the prolific growth of plant life is apparent. Days grow increasingly longer and the shorter nights warmer, both of which speed up the growth of vegetables, fruits and herbs. In human development, at the age of fourteen adolescence is usually under way and the young teenager bids farewell to childhood. This is a period in which Energy plays a key role—in terms not only of output but input. The appetite increases enormously as growth and maturation suddenly take off. This is generally not an easy time or a well-regulated one. Both psychologically and physically, early adolescence brings transformative changes that alter an individual irrevocably—sometimes creating what seems to be a whole new person.

Those born on the Taurus-Gemini cusp can easily see themselves more as a force than as a person. Not specialists in self-awareness, from an early age they forge a role in life that is active rather than passive, dynamic rather than static. Interested as children in everything around them, those born on the Cusp of Energy often fly every which way in their search for stimulation. Sometimes to the despair of their parents, who correctly accuse them of spreading themselves too thin and not sticking to any one activity, they want to do it all, to take on the world in a direct frontal assault. Some of those born on this cusp fail to form a strong ego early in life. Wanting to please, and fearful of rejection, Taurus-Gemini's may accept the wishes of others at the expense of their own. Self-assertion and building a powerful ego can become a lifelong occupation for them.

Taurus-Gemini's abundant energy, keen interest in the world around them and charm tend to draw innumerable friends and lovers. However, those involved with them are in constant fear of losing them. For some people this is both challenging and appealing. Others, however, may be turned off by Taurus-Gemini's reputation for untrustworthiness, and such preconceptions may hurt them, particularly in the areas of business and employment.

The brilliance of a Taurus-Gemini is not enough to guarantee success in a given field unless it is backed up by a string of undeniable accomplishments. Unfortunately, those born on the Cusp of Energy do not always manifest an endurance equal to their desires and impulses. While slower, more purposeful individuals just hang in there, Taurus-Gemini may find themselves being passed in life's race, as the hare was overtaken by a self-possessed and deliberate turtle. Drawing up a résumé can be a painful process for someone born in this week, since it may reveal an eclectic background lacking real depth, a short sojourn in each job and dubious accomplishments. Learning about the creation of structure and the value of limitations is essential to the growth of a Taurus-Gemini.

In relationships, Taurus-Gemini often come on too strong. Indeed the friends of Taurus-Gemini occasionally wonder why these people need to be the center of attention every minute of every day. They seem to find themselves fascinating, and to want to share that fascination with all around them. It may be necessary for them to cultivate a certain indifference to themselves if they are to improve the quality of their relationships, keeping their latest thought to themselves and making themselves more receptive and sympathetic to others.

If friends, lovers or spouses come to feel that they are only there to watch or listen to the Taurus-Gemini, and are not really appreciated or needed for themselves, the days of the relationship may well be numbered.

As mates or partners, Taurus-Geminis may well spend their time heading off after the newest exciting prospect while their counterpart deals with the mundane tasks of home management, finance and general maintenance. This tendency may be worsened when it leads Taurus-Geminis to make unfavorable comparisons, picturing their partners as dull and uninteresting. Frictions and, ultimately, breakups can result. To participate in a successful ongoing relationship, Cusp of Energy people must sacrifice some of their "brilliance" to necessary everyday tasks, thereby asserting their interest in and commitment to the relationship as well as their respect for their partners' own needs for creative and quality time. In fairness to Taurus-Geminis, however, if their mate or partner can accept them as they are, they can prove loving and faithful.

Because Taurus-Geminis combine the earthy, sensuous traits of Taurus with the airy mental characteristics of

“ENERGY”

Gemini, they can be both obsessively interested in physical matters and compulsive about checking things out. They may be characterized, in other words, by curiosity about the physical state of others, worry about their own bodies and a fascination with whether machines or equipment are generally working properly. The best partners for Taurus-Geminis are often those who are strong enough to maintain their own individuality, establishing boundaries that should not be violated or infringed upon while at the same time proving able to fulfill the Taurus-Gemini need to communicate. Sharing the interests of Taurus-Geminis is not nearly so important, however, as respecting and appreciating them.

Taurus-Geminis can make excellent parents, presenting a kaleidoscope of interests to their children. They should realistically ask themselves, however, whether their own needs do not preclude the kind of stability and empathy necessary to raise a family. Their periodic assessment of their own needs and desires, and their placement of strong limits on the scope of their activities, are in fact essential to their success in all areas of personal relationships. Before committing to a longer or deeper relationship, Taurus-Geminis need to get their priorities straight and to give deep consideration to the question of whether they are prepared to make the necessary sacrifices. Introspection, planning and soul searching do not come easily to a Taurus-Gemini but in the long run will save much pain and hardship for all concerned.

ADVICE:

Monitor the pace of your activities carefully. Seek to be more consistent and less casual in jettisoning people and ideas. Don't come on so strong. Turn off your mental motor from time to time. Confront your fears and insecurities.

TAURUS - GEMINI CUSP NOTABLES

Amazing variety has marked the career of Grace Jones, from model and movie actress (playing opposite

GRACE JONES

Conan the Destroyer and James Bond) to her performance videos Slave to Rhythm and Warm Leatherette and albums Inside Story and Boomerang OMPST. Refusing to be put in any category is typical of Taurus-Geminis, and Jones is no exception. Her remarkable looks and equally distinctive manner mark her as a true individual—one of a kind. Her explosive persona says “Handle with care,” and her ferociously uncompromising stance is not recommended for the faint-hearted. Like others born on the Cusp of Energy, Jones has plenty of this commodity to spare for a wide-ranging multitude of projects.

Energetic and prolific, Malcolm X typifies the eclectic and highly original nature of those born on the Taurus-Gemini cusp. Black separatist and Black Muslim teacher, Malcolm spoke out fearlessly against the historical oppression of his people and demanded justice for them. In 1946 he began a 7-year jail sentence for armed robbery and while in prison converted to the Nation of Islam. Upon his release, he met with Islam leader Elijah Muhammad and began work for the organization, culminating in his appointment as first national minister, from which he resigned in 1964 to establish his own organization. Feared by some Americans, Malcolm was also deeply loved by many who have continued to honor his memory since his assassination in 1965.

Wearing different hats comes naturally to Taurus-Geminis, and this is certainly true of the dynamic singer and actress Cher. A true entertainer, Cher appears equally at home in live performances and before TV and film cameras. Perhaps her most astonishing feat was getting critics to take her seriously as an actress. Nominated for a Best Supporting Actress Academy Award for her work in Silkwood, Cher then won the Best Actress Award for her performance in Moonstruck. With film success, Cher's full and flamboyant expression of herself remains irrefragable. Her marriages to Sonny Bono and Gregg Allman and romantic links with Val Kilmer, Gene Simmons and Richie Sambora have been followed with great interest by her many fans.

GEMINI I

The Week of Freedom

May 25–June 2

The Gemini I period takes Freedom as its central image. This period can be symbolically compared to a time in a young person's life when striving for independence and freedom of thought become very important. High rebelliousness is often part of this process; injustice is keenly felt and all forms of tyranny despised. However, by only defining a stance against certain established attitudes, some people at this age can be actually limiting their horizons rather than expanding them.

According to The Grand Cycle of Life, Gemini I falls approximately at the age when most teenagers are in the thick of high school. Consequently, the days that comprise Gemini I reveal an individual expressing individuality, enlarging on social and financial skills, cultivating the ability to assess the worth of things and dealing with problems of a personal and intellectual nature. Ideas and ideals come to have particular importance. This period of life can be especially painful for those who are unable to fit in with the crowd.

Gemini I's balk at restrictions and aim to maintain their freedom at all costs. Generally on the side of the individual, they hate oppression and exploitation, opposing them both in theory and in practice. Gemini I's will not usually back down from a fight. Naturally combative, they stick up for what they believe is right and will not hesitate to attack wrongdoing in any form, be it moral or practical, for Gemini I's believe there is a right way and a wrong way to do things, and that only the right way will yield uniformly positive results. One of their strongest weapons is laughter or ridicule, which they do not hesitate to pull out of their formidable verbal arsenal. Still, Gemini I's are willing to give the other fellow a second chance. Resilient, they will not quit valuable relationships easily; instead, they hang in there, letting go of resentments.

Bright, perky and alert, but also a tad abrasive, Gemini I's are high-speed players who get impatient with other people's slower responses. Often technically gifted, they can get annoyed when others are less skillful in performing a certain task. Given this low threshold of irritation, they may get stressed out easily, lashing out with irony or sarcasm. The aggression of Gemini I's is often a reaction to what they see as incompetence or stupidity, but it does not make them easy to live or work with.

Those born in the Week of Freedom have ultraquick impulses and fertile imaginations, sometimes overly so. They are constantly dreaming up new plans and schemes, perhaps at the expense of pressing matters that need attention (such as paying bills). In their lifetimes they may leave behind enough unfinished projects to occupy a dozen human beings. Gemini I's often lack the patience to implement their plans in a sensitive way. Further, they may make promises in good faith yet break them later due to new and pressing demands. Such actions undermine their own credibility.

Family life can have a grounding influence on their mercurial energies; likewise, clever mates and friends will put the quick wits and talents of Gemini I's to constructive uses, often by introducing them to interesting activities, jobs and businesses requiring close attention and maintenance. A relatively rootless Gemini I will often blossom when put to work in a structured position involving a lot of responsibility. If their work gives them the opportunity to innovate, Gemini I's may continue quite happily in the same position for years.

Those involved in relationships with Gemini I's, whether family, friends or lovers, won't need to do much guessing as to their state of mind. Those born in the Week of Freedom are both emotionally volatile and not at all shy about verbalizing any discontent they may have. In extreme cases, in fact, they can be constant complainers, though for the most part they just have a periodic need to get their dissatisfactions off their chest. Those close to them usually let them run on, picking out the core of the difficulty and letting the rest go in one ear and out the other. An emotional reaction to a Gemini I can escalate quickly into a full-scale fight. It is better to hear them out patiently, no matter how long it takes. Gemini I's have a habit of repeating themselves, so they cannot fairly accuse others of not listening to what they say.

Considering their emotional volatility and changeability, they are surprisingly loyal partners. They do tire of routine quickly, though, and may from time to time find it necessary to change the structures of their most intimate relationships to keep from being bored. Those best able to carry on with them will be able to accept their need for stimulation, variety and a regular change of scene.

Protective, Gemini I's are capable of putting their prodigious energies to use in rescuing others from trouble. Unfortunately, they sometimes wind up subjecting rescuees to their own brand of tyranny, in a benighted effort to make things turn out right. Their first impulses are often to relieve difficulties through prompt and rational action, yet the manner in which they proceed may somehow create more problems than it solves. A Gemini I may recognize the objective needs of a family member, for example, and may seek to satisfy him or her, yet may fail by not taking the relative's feelings into account. Gemini I's may give conditionally, using rewards as a means of control, and withdrawing rewards as a means of punishment.

Those born in the Week of Freedom are not at all above emotional manipulation. In fact, they rarely hesitate to turn on their considerable charm when they want to get their way. They are highly seductive, and few can resist their often considerable sex appeal. In time, however, their flirtatious and provocative allure may wear thin if not backed up by a reliably sympathetic stance.

As their mates and lovers will attest, Gemini I's can become unhinged with lightning speed; they are at their best when they keep their nerves under control. Accordingly, they should avoid all drugs and stimulants, particularly alcohol, that will alter their consciousness or cause them to be less present.

ADVICE:

*Work to finish what you start. Develop the patience to interact fully with others.
Your ideals may have to be sacrificed at times for the sake of harmony.
Avoid escapism in its manifold guises. Keep busy and happy, but do not neglect your inner emotional life.*

GEMINI I NOTABLES

A symbol of sexual freedom for her generation, Marilyn Monroe exhibited the erratic behavior and tendency to get into trouble characteristic of Gemini I's.

MARILYN MONROE

Marilyn's emotional volatility and extreme need for change also characterize those born in the Week of Freedom. Marilyn's gift for comedy was discovered in Hollywood and gave her an important creative outlet. The flip side of her flamboyant exterior was deeply depressive, no doubt the effect of childhood poverty and sexual abuse. Perhaps Marilyn craved security and stability more than anything else, but, as with many Gemini I's, she found them impossible to achieve. Linked romantically with some of the most powerful men of her time and married to sports icon Joe DiMaggio and writer Arthur Miller, happiness was rarely her lot.

The mercurial nature of Gemini I's, moving quickly in thought and deed, is part of the astrological legacy of John Fitzgerald Kennedy. Bringing a new spirit of communication to the White House, Kennedy delighted in media contacts. More than any other single event, it was his tv debates with opponent Richard Nixon that resulted in his election. Kennedy symbolized a kind of political and personal freedom that inspired millions of Americans to adore their young president and increased the shock factor of the dark days after his assassination on Nov. 22, 1963. The day the lights went out in America was particularly horrifying because of the brightness with which they had blazed during his presidency.

Generally regarded as America's greatest poet, Walt Whitman lived a life in which freedom was the central symbol. A writer of free verse, a freethinker and one who urged others to express their freest impulses, Whitman was an archetypal Gemini I. Originally a Long Island schoolteacher and editor of the Brooklyn Eagle, it was not until he was 36 that his poems were published in the single volume Leaves of Grass. Whitman was a pantheist who loved all humanity but also put his ideals on the line by working as a volunteer nurse during the Civil War. His homosexuality and controversial lifestyle led to church opposition to the naming of Philadelphia's Walt Whitman Bridge after him.

GEMINI II

The Week of New Language

June 3–10

The Gemini II period takes New Language as its central image. According to The Grand Cycle of Life, this period can be likened to the time when a young person is preparing to leave high school, either to enter the working world or to continue on to college. During this transition filled with uncertainty and promise, important career decisions must be made, planned out and verbalized.

The days that comprise Gemini II point to many of the areas that come into play at this juncture. Critical thinking and a concomitant ability to express ideas in written and verbal form become increasingly important. Accuracy and consistency are crucial, but so are imagination and vision. Finally, a strong sense of individuality must be cultivated, and with it a well-rounded character that recognizes both comic and tragic elements in life.

Gemini II's show a strong desire to communicate their thoughts and feelings verbally. They also need to be sure that others have understood their message and can see their point of view, even without agreeing with it. Yet the means of expression of Gemini II's are highly personal, to the point of the development of their own unique language. This may lead to all kinds of problems, tensions and frustrations, since they are frequently misunderstood. Moreover, when trying to put their point across, some Gemini II's use a barrage of words, relying on quantity over quality to win the day, or try different lines of argument all at once. In their intense desire to communicate, the meaning may get lost in the shuffle.

Entertaining and witty, Gemini II's know how to dazzle, and how to hold the attention of their audience. Over the long haul required by committed relationships, however, this manner may lose its glow, being seen first as superficial, then as irritating. Also, a Gemini II's level of verbal and mental insistence may often be so high that others become fatigued or overwhelmed by the barrage. Sensing the urgency of a Gemini II's need for understanding, people may expediently pretend that they have understood when in fact they have not; their lack of comprehension may emerge later, in midstream, bringing blame and reproach on the Gemini II.

The spoken word is by no means the only mode of communication of Gemini II's. Their body language can be a powerful addition to their well-developed mental characteristics. Gemini II's have a great need for physical exercise and expression, particularly in their younger years but lasting on throughout their lives. Such activities provide the balance to their quick wits without which they might be deprived of sleep and appetite. In addition, healthy doses of affection provide an easy, nonverbal form of communication, making Gemini II's feel appreciated and loved, and reinforcing their need to share.

The competitive urges of those born in this week can easily get out of hand. Competition keeps Gemini II's sharp but may also make them contentious, and their rapier wit can leave deep scars. Unless they find a way to mute their impulse to criticize, Gemini II's may alienate even their closest friends. Gemini II's are equally hard on themselves. When this happens it is often a consequence of poor self-image, perhaps a result of parental accusations of irresponsibility, flakiness or incompetence. If this problem can be corrected the responses of the Gemini II will soften. Much of what is at work is a fear of appearing foolish or inadequate, or of being misunderstood. Rejecting old scripts and learning to be easier on themselves, to be happier and more self-accepting and to come to a rapprochement with their own dark side, they can arrive at more productive and fulfilling personal relationships.

In their choice of a mate, those born in this week are often carried away by their desires and only discover later that the person they have chosen to live with cares little about what they have to say and has no interest in devoting time to listening to it. Gemini II's can also be drawn to quiet, reserved people whose silence and need for privacy they may, unfortunately, end up interpreting as a rejection. Rarely, however, are other fluent communicators as attractive to those born in this week as the strong, silent types are. Not only do opposites attract, but Gemini II's are secretly fascinated by the dark side of life. Apparently extroverted and happy, they sometimes force their smiles and gaiety. Driven to repress their shadow personality by fear of rejection, Gemini II's frequently summon up such a dark side in the form of a lover or friend.

A more realistic approach to choosing a partner obviously aids Gemini II's. Tempted to choose people from radically different backgrounds, they often relate more successfully to those from the same city or neighborhood, ethnic background or economic stratum. Shared associations and idioms often free the lines of static and make communication much easier for them. In time, such bonds of commonality can contribute more of lasting value to a Gemini II relationship than the passion of their dark-side attractions.

Gemini II's have a strong need for variety. Those involved with them are often called upon to provide new horizons and a change of scene, particularly when the Gemini II lacks the organizational talents to get such a project off the ground. Those born in this week match up well with practical types who can get the job done with little fuss or excitement. Such combinations meld over the long haul, with the Gemini II providing the innovative ideas and the partner the ability to ground, refine and implement them. Building a home base, raising a family and even working as a partner in a business or hobby are all possible results of such relationships.

When their needs are not met, Gemini II's will almost always seek out someone more understanding. If this person is able to maintain objectivity and fairness toward the Gemini II's primary lover, partner or mate, his or her sympathy may prove beneficial, even a lifesaver, to the primary relationship. Unfortunately, however, the third party is not always so scrupulous, and, consequently, breakups often occur. Gemini II's must be careful of attracting types who appear sympathetic but are actually pursuing selfish and destructive ends.

Try not to come on in a rush. Be clear in what you say but also diplomatic. Don't be inattentive to the impression you make or the idea others have of you. There is great value in silence. Take the time to develop deep friendships.

GEMINI II NOTABLES

The Wizard of Oz tapped America's mythic unconscious, but perhaps the film's impact would not have been as great without the presence of its young star, Judy Garland. In real life, Garland lived a tragic life filled with personal and drug problems, belying her innocent image of Dorothy in the film. Both as a singer and actress, she specialized in developing a new form of communication in the entertainment industry, which lent her the stamp of someone born in the Week of New Language. Like many Gemini II's, Judy sought to deny and escape her shadow personality, but to no avail. Her death by suicide in 1969 at age 47 left her many fans grief stricken. Garland's daughter Liza Minnelli has carried on in her mother's grand tradition.

One of the leading poets of the Beat Generation, Allen Ginsberg was active in a wide range of protest activities, from the antiwar movement to gay rights. The "New Language" that he expressed in his mid-50s poem Howl was a wedding of prose and poetry, of statement and metaphor, of profanity and high-blown verse. Ginsberg, often bearded and sandaled, traveled widely to deliver his message, accompanying himself on the harmonium and chanting his Zen-like messages. Obsessed with communication, Gemini II Ginsberg attended thousands of political meetings in order to make his unique artistic contribution to fellow artists, students and the general public alike. Particularly in later years, his Jewish identity asserted itself strongly.

Credited with creating a new language in American architecture, Frank Lloyd Wright sought to express the organic and natural in his work, frequently adapting his creations to an already existing environment. First working in the offices of Louis Sullivan designing houses, Wright broke away to establish his own personal style. Although his private life was filled with instability and many personal problems characteristic of a Gemini II, Wright designed 1,000 buildings, of which fewer than half were actually built. His controversial design methods for the Tokyo Imperial Hotel were vindicated when the structure survived the great earthquake of 1927.

FRANK LLOYD WRIGHT

Wright wrote and lectured actively, had 7 children from 3 marriages and died 2 months short of his 90th birthday.

More Gemini II's: Paul Gauguin, Francis Crick, Barbara Bush, Cole Porter, Johnny Depp, Maurice Sendak, Richard Foreman, Prince Philip, (TAFKA) Prince, Rocky Graziano, Thomas Mann, Alexander Pushkin, Diego Velazquez, Billie Whitelaw, Laurie Anderson, Bjorn Borg, Federico Garcia Lorca, Bill Moyers, Judith Malina, Bruce Dern, Madame Chiang Kai-Shek, Josephine Baker, Spalding Gray.

The Week of the Seeker

The Gemini III period takes The Seeker as its central image. This period can be compared to the time when a young person must say goodbye to the teenage years and actively prepare to find a place for him/herself in the adult world. Seeking a job, residence, friends, perhaps a mate, or searching for new ideas and horizons are activities that engage people of this age.

The days that comprise Gemini III point to issues that now emerge—being strong enough to confront and persuade, to seek adventure and roll back frontiers, and finally to invest in the future. The Seeker must be prepared to go as far as is necessary and to cut loose from self-imposed limitations and doubts that can only hold him/her back. This is a time of fearless exploration and of learning through life experience.

The primary drive of a Gemini III is to go beyond limitations imposed by society and nature. This may take the form of a drive toward success, or an overcoming of physical limitations. Gemini III's are never happier when they are on the move: probing, testing, tasting and exploring the most interesting things life has to offer. Not afraid to take chances, those born in this week are attracted by risk and danger. Adventurers in every sense of the word, Gemini III's are restless types. Their style is to remain unattached and thus free to progress as far as possible. Life is never dull with a Gemini III around. Those born in this period do not necessarily have to travel to far-off lands to explore and find challenge. For them all of life is an adventure. Thus Gemini III's keep others guessing as to their next move.

Those born in the Week of the Seeker are neither teachers nor leaders. They may lack the patience and understanding to teach, and also the qualities necessary to lead: the dogged determination, ambition and desire to control others. Those who understand them will quickly realize their need to strike out on their own, and will not try to bind them to an executive or other responsible position in a business or family. Gemini III's are capable of taking the helm, particularly when they encounter incompetence or neglect; yet they may also show an indulgent, accepting side, proving content to drift and dream. Such self-satisfaction can prove a powerful deterrent to their progress in their careers.

Gemini III's often have a clouded self-image; they have difficulty seeing who they really are. This may have its beginnings in childhood with the idolization of a parent or family member, often of the opposite sex. Rejection, misunderstanding or abuse by such a person can be traumatic for them, giving them deep scars to carry into later life. Disillusionment in general can be a problem for Gemini III's; they tend to be extremely optimistic at the outset of an endeavor or relationship, often setting a person or activity up for a later fall from grace.

Gemini III's have an undeniable tendency to please others through charm, and many born in this week would rather stretch the truth a bit than be rejected for telling it as it is. Insightful about the needs of those around them, they can be powerfully controlling and persuasive in a subtle manner. They know how to get their way with people, and how to capture the hearts of their mates and friends. At the extreme end of the scale, those born in this week can tell tall tales, and may be suspected of being cons, flatterers or even liars.

"SEEKER"

Many Gemini III's are surprisingly good with money. They may not always give the appearance of financial practicality or foresight, but they can manage a family or a business quite well. They are also capable of latching on to a practical partner or someone else who can guarantee them the financial stability that they so sorely need. Money can come to symbolize freedom to Gemini III's, although they rarely have a desperate need to accumulate it for its own sake.

Those born in the Week of the Seeker often have a strong physical side yet choose to neglect it, seeking to transcend life's earthier pleasures. Thus they lack the grounded qualities of those who are capable of selfish and shameless indulgence. Metaphysical in the most basic sense of the word, those born in this week may see mastery of the tangible realities of life as only a first step toward higher attainment.

Gemini III's must at times be wary of going too far, and of getting caught up in endless striving without achievement.

Love and affection are important to Gemini III's but are not usually given top priority.

Those emotionally involved with those born in this week can find them sometimes warm and giving, in other moods quite cool and detached. Indeed, they are sometimes accused of blowing hot and cold, and with some justification. This is usually more the result of emotional sensitivity, however, than of a calculated desire to hurt.

Because of their intense need for change in relationships, Gemini III's may spend a period of their life moving from one partner to another. Even those who can establish a well-grounded primary relationship are constantly tempted away from it by a career, a hobby or another person. Gemini III's can be faithful, however, as long as their partner makes few demands on their fidelity and gives them room to breathe. Attempts to hold those born in this week to strict obligations and a formal routine are usually doomed to failure. On the other hand, these Seekers are quite capable of imposing stringent regimens and rules on themselves when they consider it necessary.

The seductive qualities of Gemini III's tend to land them in trouble. Their choice of a partner often shows remarkably good sense, but they may bind themselves to a friend or lover who can prove bothersome or destructive.

Regretting such choices, Gemini III's may still find it hard to disentangle themselves from an emotionally messy situation.

This may be partly due to an innate reluctance to reject or consciously hurt others, or to a feeling of helplessness and hesitancy in making the decision to cut ties. When a relationship must be ended, however, it is more often than not the Gemini III who either ends up doing the rejecting or allows or manipulates the other person to do so. Control of closure seems to be important to them, although they would prefer that relationships end as pleasantly as possible.

A Seeker in the true sense of the word, photographer Margaret Bourke-White was always ready to go that extra mile to get exactly the picture she wanted. One of the first to shoot extensively from the air in civilian and military aircraft and balloons, fear did not stand in the way of this Gemini III's creative opportunities. The first female war correspondent, she survived shells and a torpedoing during WWII to bring her photos home to the American public. Her insistence on getting the right shot and capturing the moment, and her intensity in doing so, continued until the end of her career. A wide variety of her work was published in U.S. magazines and newspapers, as well as in illustrated books about her and in her own books.

The Nobel Prize-winning Irish poet William Butler Yeats sent his imagination out to distant lands, the farthest reaches of space and to other levels of reality to collect his images. Fantasy, imagination, history and the occult were all of tremendous interest to this Gemini III Seeker. Yeats was a curious blend of romantic and classicist, of traditionalist and modernist. In Sailing to Byzantium he speaks of "the young in one another's arms," while in The Second Coming he pictures the "rough beast [that] slouches toward Bethlehem to be born." A dreamer, admittedly, but a technical master and insightful observer as well,

WILLIAM BUTLER YEATS

Yeats' Gemini III coolness and detachment is probably best illustrated by his epitaph, written by himself: "Cast a cold eye on life, on death—Horseman, pass by."

Barbara McClintock won the Nobel Prize in physiology at age 81, an astonishing feat. She began her work as an American scientist in 1919 and forced a male-dominated profession to acknowledge her genius during a career that spanned over 60 years. McClintock was a true Seeker who would not rest until she had made some of the most significant discoveries in the history of the biological sciences. Studying genetic phenomena in corn, McClintock was able to show the link between cellular structure and inherited traits long before the advent of advanced electronic microscopy and the discovery of DNA.

GEMINI-CANCER CUSP

The Cusp of Magic

June 19–24

The Gemini-Cancer cusp is an admixture of the third sign of the zodiac, Gemini, and the fourth sign of the zodiac, Cancer. This cusp can be symbolically likened to the period around twenty-one years of age in the human life, and it marks the beginning of summer in the northern hemisphere. The Gemini-Cancer cusp may be said to represent Magic. During this period of the year many plants are coming into lush, full bloom. The day is longer and the night shorter than at any other point in the year. This is the time of traditionally magical “midsummer’s eve,” a warm, enchanted night, replete with bewitching smells and sounds, on which supernatural events take place. In human development, at the age of twenty-one, adolescence is over and adulthood is said to begin. Magic particularly plays a key role in terms of the magnetic power of love and the enchantment of romance. The young adult experiences an almost childlike wonder and awe at the beauty of the world and the horizons that have opened up.

Those born during the magical cusp of the summer solstice quickly fall under the spell of enchantment. Romantic and inspirational, Gemini-Cancers often put their talents and energies in service of a higher purpose, be it family, religion, philosophy, arts or political or social causes. Because they can wholeheartedly throw themselves into devotional activities, those born on this cusp often appear as mild, even self-effacing. For many of these individuals, anonymity is a goal in any career they follow. There are also more aggressive Gemini-Cancers, however, who become assertive as they mature and have few problems letting the world know who they are.

Easily seduced, Gemini-Cancers can also enchant others, whether consciously or unconsciously; these seductive individuals may have a sweetly innocent charm. They must be wary of being imposed upon, but they usually have good defensive instincts, and in the emotional sphere even mild Gemini-Cancers will gently lay down guidelines that should not be overstepped. The more aggressive Gemini-Cancers are often aware of their persuasive powers, which they may use without qualm to get their way, even when other individuals are hurt in the process.

Although possessed of charm and magnetism, Gemini-Cancers can be remarkably cool customers. They have a useful objectivity, and their reasoning powers make an effective foil to their deep emotions. Influenced by both Gemini and Cancer, they are in fact an interesting blend of logic and feeling. When those born on this cusp make an appeal to the emotions of others, they do so in a detached, thoughtful way. Not easily upset, they inspire confidence through their sympathy, concern and willingness to help. Summer-solstice people have a way of entering the hearts of those they love, and a reluctance to give up their position there, even when separations prove necessary.

Gemini-Cancers tend to be private people who will not easily grant access to their inner world. They frequently do best when they are able to work at home, and they often set up their home as a kind of retreat or sanctuary. To be allowed to share the living space of a Gemini-Cancer implies great trust and respect. An invitation to visit this highly personal world is more often felt as a true gift, or the reflection of a desire to share, than as a sign of ostentation or of a need for sociability.

Gemini-Cancers must beware of isolating themselves from the society around them and living in an unproductive dreamworld. Such detachment will hold them back in their personal and spiritual development, and toward the end of their lives they may view it as a sign of failure. Since staying in touch with reality is especially important for Gemini-Cancers, they may find friends and lovers who are more extroverted than they are an essential link to the world. They should also beware of a kind of passive selfishness, in which it seems to others that they think the world revolves around them and that they constantly demand attention, if without saying so. Their special needs and wants as sensitive individuals can impose heavy demands on their friends and intimates, who may at the same time find themselves denying their own emotional and physical requirements.

No area is more important to Gemini-Cancers than love. They see love as a primary reason to live, one that may get them through many a difficult period. Forced to choose between love, on the one hand, and wealth or power, on the other, those born in this week usually choose the former. Many Gemini-Cancers are quite able to love from afar; platonic love has a special meaning for them. Others see the possession of the love object as a necessary and blissful consummation, but they, too, are patient in the pursuit. Quiet persistence and a belief in their powers can guarantee them success.

Gemini-Cancers have a tremendous capacity for love but are equally capable of withholding it. No matter how deeply in love they fall, they are masters of their emotions and can consequently be very dangerous people to be involved with. You must listen to them carefully, for although they can give their hearts fully, the fact that they are spending their time with you is no guarantee that they have done so.

Gemini-Cancers are capable of a wide range of personal interaction, from acquaintances and friendships to full-blown passion. Each relationship will have its own structure, including what is and is not allowed in the area of physical contact. Sensitivity to such laws is definitely a prerequisite for the relationship's future.

Gemini-Cancers can be nurturing parents, but many will think twice before they make the lifelong commitment of having children. This may be because, as children, they tend to enjoy the warmth of a close family; they can suffer terribly in conditions of marital strife or divorce. They have a tendency to idolize at least one of their parents, and to need to get along well with their parents once they are grown. It is not surprising, then, that once they decide they are truly in love (generally an important prerequisite to commitment for them), they can make faithful and devoted mates. Never take the romantic needs of one born on the Cusp of Magic for granted, however; candlelight dinners, vacations in glamorous locations, and the occasional spontaneous gift are all musts to keep the flame bright.

ADVICE:

Exercise your magical powers with care. You may need to be a bit tougher on yourself. Keep your eye on the goal and resist any tendency to drift. Do not lose yourself so readily in ecstatic experiences or you may have trouble finding yourself again. Beware of repressing your feelings or allowing destructive emotions to control you.

GEMINI - CANCER CUSP NOTABLES

The life of Aung San Suu Kyi reads a bit like a fairy tale and, although amazing is not always a pleasant one. The daughter of Aung San, formerly considered the father of his country, Burma, resided quietly in England until 1988, married to a British academic and raising their 2 children while continuing her studies. Almost overnight, during a visit to her mother in Burma in 1988, she became the leader of the country's prodemocracy movement, for which she was placed under house arrest between 1989 and 1995. In 1991 she was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize for her nonviolent struggle for democracy. The Magic of this slight, lovely woman who believes in the beauty of children and flowers is equal to the military might opposing her.

AUNG SAN SUU KYI

Master of the romantic adventure story, H. Rider Haggard, in over 40 thrilling novels, including King Solomon's Mines and She, laid the groundwork for the exotic exploits of later comic-book and film heroes such as Tintin, Conan the Barbarian and Indiana Jones. Filled with love, peril and wild fantasy, Haggard's books are often set in the African wilderness and involve lost civilizations and monumental, albeit primitive, battles. This Gemini-Cancer writer was able to give full rein to his inspiration and whisk his readers away on a magic carpet ride into unknown realms. Although his work is a bit dated today, it can still provide some gripping moments and transform a quiet evening alone into an exciting adventure through an undiscovered world.

This leading actress for both serious and romantic roles is both a Vassar and Yale Drama School graduate. Meryl Streep wowed audiences the world over in her performances in The Deer Hunter, Kramer vs. Kramer, The French Lieutenant's Woman, Sophie's Choice and

MERYL STREEP

The River Wild. Streep has the ability to portray a highly romantic image with much more than just good looks. The brand of Magic that this Gemini-Cancer works has more to do with voice and gesture than with just a beautiful face. Her years of experience in stage productions prepared her magnificently for the intimate moments she creates on screen.

CANCER I

The Week of the Empath

June 25–July 2

The Cancer I period takes The Empath as its central image. This period can be compared to a time in the early adult life when the need to understand, feel and, to an extent, to identify with others comes to the fore. Such understanding may extend to the life history, feelings or personality of another person. It may also involve sympathy for another person's ideas or way of thinking. This process is not only important in developing basic humanity, but also because without some degree of empathy success in the world of society will be denied.

The days that comprise Cancer I symbolically reveal the young adult developing the capacity to open up and receive positive influences from the world but also to be more discriminating and resilient in defending against harmful energies. In addition, learning about how the emotional life works, how the unconscious functions and, in general, what motivates people to do what they do figure prominently.

Cancer I's are hard to figure out. Emotionally complex, they combine sharply contrasting qualities in their psychological makeup. They may give an entirely different impression than in another, according to their mood. A Cancer I may strike one person as outgoing, another as retiring, one as positive and expansive, another as negative and depressive, still others as easygoing, others as difficult. Only those who live with Cancer I's day in and day out are fully able to appreciate their depth and diversity.

Part of the reason for the variety of their emotional palette is their sensitivity. Empathic, Cancer I's quickly pick up on the feelings of others—so much so that they may mistake such feelings for their own. Those born in this week may find themselves replaying other people's scripts and hence playing a role in life's daily drama that is not really theirs. Developing their self-awareness, gaining an accurate view of their personal interactions and getting a grip on their emotions will be essential to them.

Because they are so at the mercy of the feelings of others as children, Cancer I's generally cry out for protection. Even when protection is granted, these Empaths may spend a lifetime seeking out people to mother and nurture them. But if those born in this week are instead exposed to tough and unsympathetic treatment by their families and, later, by the world, they are capable of surrounding themselves with a virtually impenetrable shell. Love can enable such Cancer I's to feel again, melting their outer defenses and allowing them to express their true emotions. A great deal of pent-up resentment and frustration may have to be voiced, however, before their hurt is eased and they are able to trust again.

One should not get the idea, however, that Cancer I's are wishy-washy characters out of touch with worldly realities. In fact, they are very clever in getting their way. Those born in this week generally give money a high priority, and they are often financially astute. Their investment sense can be excellent, and they can frequently make stocks and other holdings pay off. Also in the realm of technical skills, they show a good grasp of whatever material they make their own, and a good ability to implement their plans.

Aggression can play an ambiguous role in the lives of Cancer I's: they are naturally aggressive, and can have difficulty sublimating this instinct into positive expression, particularly in the sexual, verbal or athletic sphere. Too often they swing from angry outbursts to repression, which often leads them into melancholia, in extreme cases, their anger can be self-destructive. Finding a métier that allows them easy expression of their aggression is an important life task for them, and one that they often overlook.

Those born in this week are capable of withdrawing from the world for months or even years, doing battle with themselves in an attempt to come to grips with their problems. The challenge a Cancer I faces is to move from being a person helplessly adrift in a sea of feeling, just able to keep his or her head above water, into being one who can swim confidently in the swift currents of life. The most successful Cancer I's are those who can put their fantasy to work in a constructive way, and who can share their unique view of the world with others. First, of course, they must conquer their inner fears and liberate themselves from self- or parentally imposed behavioral stereotypes. Next they may have to overcome inflexibility and real or imagined handicaps. Through sheer guts and determination, they are often capable of overcoming these and other obstacles, and of putting their acute psychological perceptions to work in the service of those around them. Professionally they often do well when self-employed, operating from a home base that may be connected to their living space. Should they choose to have children, the caring and nurturing aspects of their personalities augur well for their abilities as parents.

For those who live with them, it may be difficult to stand by and watch as Cancer I's bottle up their feelings or enter into their self-imposed isolation. While it may look like self-torture, it is almost impossible, and in fact usually inadvisable, to get down in the soup with Cancer I's.

A more beneficial stance is usually to back off and wait patiently until they surface and seek human interaction again. Patience is an obligatory virtue for those desiring a successful relationship with these individuals.

On the other hand, Cancer I's have a great deal to offer in a relationship: sympathy, technical proficiency, financial astuteness and a good managerial sense. Because of their need to spend time at home, they can be counted on to keep things in good working order and to provide comfort and security.

Cancer I's can be extremely persuasive, at times too much so. Their need to persuade can outstrip the advisability of their counsel, leaving them saddled with the guilt of having sent someone off in a wrong direction. Cancer I's pride themselves on doing their homework on given subjects, and when their research is thorough it will yield positive results. Good friends know, however, that emotional strain can cloud their thoughts, easily throwing them off track, so that they may offer confused judgments and advice with the same air of conviction and authority as cogent ones.

C A N C E R I N O T A B L E S

Practically everyone knows the story of Helen Keller, the deaf, dumb and blind girl who overcame overwhelming odds in her struggle to read and speak. The primary obstacles in Keller's struggle, other than her disabilities, were her own aggression, anger and uncontrolled feelings, encountered in lesser degree by many Cancer I's. Perhaps the most significant event in her life was meeting her teacher, Annie Sullivan, and establishing a strong empathic bond with her. A true Empath, Keller was also able to feel the distress, despair and hope of the thousands of disadvantaged individuals she worked with during her lifetime. Dedicating herself to the cause of the blind and other physically disadvantaged people, she worked unceasingly to better their condition and give them the opportunity to learn as she had.

HELEN KELLER

The German novelist and poet Hermann Hesse was less appreciated in his own time than in the 60s, when his works became immensely popular with a younger generation who saw him as an early explorer in the realms of imagination, drugs and higher states of reality and consciousness. Keyed into emotional expression, like many Cancer I's, Hesse explored the deep feelings of his unusual characters in such works as Steppenwolf, Siddhartha and Narcissus and Goldmund. The religious and spiritual elements of life inevitably played an important role in his work, but Hesse did not hesitate to show the anguish, humiliation, suffering and pain that are the basis of the human condition.

The former Princess of Wales, Lady Diana Spencer has garnered more front-page space for the past 10 years than many of the world's leaders. Although most of Britain's general public has viewed the royal family's shenanigans with a mixture of feigned horror and amusement, Lady Di has gained the respect of many around the world for emerging from her divorce from Prince Charles stronger and more self-assured. Her increasing dedication to philanthropic causes on her own and her ability to touch the hearts of those disadvantaged people whom she champions mark her as a Cancer I Empath. Her caring and nurturing aspects, both as a mom and as a social worker, are typical of those born in this week.

CANCER II

The Week of the Unconventional

July 3–10

The Cancer II period takes The Unconventional as its central image. This period can be likened to the time in a young adult's life when out-of-the-way activities and unusual people occupy interest. Moreover, the challenge to be personally unique may be a focus, not in an adolescent way but, rather, in the course of asserting individuality. No areas are considered too far out for consideration or study, and few if any activities are considered off limits. The value of privacy and of a private inner life are fully recognized at this time.

The days that comprise Cancer II deal with examining group values, revealing hidden secrets, expressing flamboyance, and calling up and exploring strange thoughts and fantasies. Destabilizing and self-destructive forces play their role here as well. In this fantasy-rich period of life, the thing most frowned upon is dullness or lack of imagination.

Cancer II's can appear quite normal, and may occupy ordinary positions in the working world, but they are irresistibly attracted to the unusual and the bizarre. Few colleagues and associates are ever granted access to their secret world; only their intimates come to realize, often after years of close association, how closely their fascination with all that is strange and curious mirrors their own inner self.

"Why can't you do things normally?" is a question too often reverberating in the heads of Cancer II's. Such questions, often reflecting internalized parental attitudes from childhood, may keep them at a desk job or other mundane task for years as they try to prove to the world that they are normal, or desperately attempt to escape their lonely inner world. An ordinary job can be a refuge, a secure hiding place for those born in this week. By burying their personality in an anonymous position with a firm or business, they may avoid scrutiny and allay their fears of being found out.

In their free time, however, they can allow their wacky, zany side a bit more freedom. Interactions with unusual friends allow them the opportunity to share their wilder side and to act out some of their unconscious fantasies.

They may vacation in a far-off land, or dream of living there, or even actually do so for a time. Besides pursuing activities like these for their personal satisfaction, they sometimes achieve financial prosperity outside their day job, for they have imaginative ideas. Success in this area usually involves the auspices of a friend or partner of a more businesslike and practical bent; Cancer II's are rarely good at implementing their own vivid thoughts, and it takes others to see the commercial possibilities of their fantasy worlds. Once brought to light, however, these can strike a responsive chord in the community at large. Thus those born in this week are capable of achieving unexpected financial success far afield of their everyday work.

Those born in this week may be collectors, readers or movie watchers in their spare time, but only subjects filled with vivid fantasy will hold their attention for long. Particularly drawn to the dark side of human experience, Cancer II's are often fascinated by crime and colorful illicit activities. They often make friends with extreme types, and are capable of being so interested in such people that they wind up living with or marrying one.

UNCONVENTIONAL

Obsession may come to dominate the life of a Cancer II. It is hard for them to control their desires, particularly when they have become attached to a love object who is less than responsive. In fact a hopeless love can become the central sticking point of a Cancer II's life, and such individuals can ultimately manifest self-destructive tendencies. It is important, then, that they learn lessons of nonattachment, which usually means dealing effectively with their own compulsive needs. This kind of inner work is essential to the psychological health of those born in the Week of the Unconventional.

Unhappily, it can also happen that Cancer II's just get stuck in their own inner worlds. A profound fear of rejection, criticism or outright ridicule often makes them afraid to reveal their personal visions. The reality of the more introverted Cancer II's may come to be confined to the four walls of their home, from which they venture out seldom or never. Even those who take regular jobs are expert at hiding when they are away from their work, and many wish simply not to be disturbed.

Cancer II's share their lives best with others who also value privacy. Their homes can become museums, filled with objects both gorgeous and hideous often acquired through their collecting instincts or those of their unusual mate or partner. But Cancer II taste is itself highly personal, and is definitely not socially oriented the interior decorating of those born in this week can be quite shocking to the casual visitor. Cancer II's tend to be lavish in their expenditures, and will go to extraordinary lengths to make their living space vivid and flamboyant.

The more conservative, particularly parents and children of Cancer II's who have little choice but to live at least part of their lives with them, may have a difficult time getting those born in this week to act in a socially acceptable manner on all or even most occasions. Family members often find themselves simply holding their breath when it is time for a Cancer II relative to take center stage; there is really no telling what might come out of their mouths, or what moves it might strike their funny bone to make. Relatives may find it equally discomfiting, on the other hand, if the Cancer II simply withdraws and refuses to participate at all.

Many Cancer II's are actually mild individuals who ask little more than to be left alone. But they can be a great deal of fun for their close friends, who will find them sensitive, thoughtful and caring. Often the sensitivity of Cancer II's to the peculiarities of quite normal people, and their valuable psychological insights and support, especially in times of bereavement or of parental or marital difficulty, can earn them a valued position in the lives of others. By capturing their imaginations, they can achieve respect in their social circle or even in the commercial world. However, Cancer II's may suffer greatly if they fail to find an audience with which to share their thoughts.

ADVICE:

Make a real effort to get out in the world. Toughen your stance a bit and try not to be so sensitive. Develop your financial sense and cultivate your talent for maintenance and continuity. Keep contact with those who care about you. Put your active fantasy and imagination to productive use.

CANCER II NOTABLES

Winning back-to-back Oscars for Philadelphia and Forrest Gump, Tom Hanks displayed sensitive characterizations of two figures who, rejected by the world, demanded and received recognition and respect on their own terms. Hanks's fascination with the unusual and bizarre mark him as a Cancer II. Few would have guessed 15 years ago that he would be regarded today as one of America's leading film stars, and, like many born in his week, his path has not been restricted to the straight and narrow. Hanks's deeply human qualities mark him as a compassionate individual who has known emotional pain and emerged from his experiences enriched on both a personal and a professional level.

The haunted, frightening world of Franz Kafka is filled with the kinds of extraordinarily imaginative visions that are typical of many Cancer II's. Like others born in this week, Kafka was not able to live a conventional life or express himself in conventional terms. In his story The Metamorphosis, the protagonist Gregor Samsa wakes up one morning to discover he has been changed into a gigantic insect and then is forced to live out his rejection at the hands of his family, who try to murder him and finally leave him to die out of sheer disgust for what he has become. In The Trial, an anonymous character called Joseph K. is arrested for no reason and hounded in and out of the courtroom until his execution. Dreamlike yet real, Kafka's images are unnerving and unsettling in the extreme.

The life of Mexican painter Frida Kahlo was filled with pain but also with artistic exaltation. Contracting polio at age 5 left her crippled, and at the age of 20, a collision damaged her spine, limbs and internal organs, necessitating over 30 operations. Yet her hunger for life and extraordinary artistic abilities sustained her, along with her passionate relationship with Diego Rivera, with whom she fell in love as a teenager and later married. Unconventional in almost every respect, Kahlo was typical of other Cancer II's in her obsessive refusal to give up on her marriage or career and her determination to share her highly unusual inner world with students and the public alike.

CANCER III

The Week of the Persuader

July 11–18

The Cancer III period takes The Persuader as its central image. According to The Grand Cycle of Life, in human terms, this period relates to the years of one's mid- to late twenties, when persuasive powers can be applied both in business and personal relationships. This is a time when all avenues may be tried and opportunities exploited. Founding a business of one's own, finding a life partner, starting a family or seeking to widen opportunities are all typical of this period.

The days that comprise Cancer III symbolically illustrate the active interest of young adults to make something of themselves through investing in a career, taking advantage of situations, convincing and persuading others of their worth and using materials at hand to build a lasting and solid structure.

Cancer III people know how to convince others of their worth and get them to do their bidding. Powerful manipulators of their environment, Cancer III's often manifest great drive and determination. Even the shyest and most retiring Cancer III's nurse private ambitions; the more aggressive of those born in this week make little effort to conceal their desire to rise to the top of their profession. The underlying dynamic of their character, however, is that success, for them, is the best antidote for uncertainty. Yet they rarely fall victim to blind ambition, preferring to invest in themselves than indulge in materialism or ego-tripping.

Cancer III's know how to wait, watch and listen. Observant of what goes on around them, they are good at reading the signs of the times and knowing when to act. Persuaders, their ability to convince others is supported by a solid bedrock of observation, and on having facts and results at their fingertips. Cancer III's, then, are comfortable dealing with the physical realities of life. In fact, they persuade others less by their words than by their presence alone. Strong personalities, those born in this period are not shy about quietly and effectively applying pressure.

Passionate people, Cancer III's are no strangers to the depths of human emotion. In the same way that insecurity can be viewed as the motor behind the ambition of Cancer III's, their passion for something can be viewed as the gasoline. And usually, their beliefs are something they are passionate about. By establishing contact with others of like mind, they are able to give solid support to their ideas. When they are convinced they are working for the highest good of an organization or group they are difficult to oppose and can usually obtain significant benefits for all concerned.

Whether at work or at home, they usually exert a powerful force behind the scenes, or as team members. Cancer III's make excellent managers and critics; they have a sixth sense for the weaknesses and inadequacies of others and can usually provide direction or guidance to remedy even the most extreme difficulties.

Part of the personal power of Cancer III's comes from their ability to control their own needs. In relationships, for example, they would sooner be alone than enter a dubious or unstable partnership. Knowing themselves well enough to recognize the limitations of their ability to commit to the responsibilities of everyday life, Cancer III's beginning a relationship will be honest with the other person from the outset, rarely pretending to be something they are not. In any case, living alone is not really a problem for those born in this week. They generally require few luxuries, and can efficiently order their lives, particularly financially, without interference from others. Cancer III's are well able to sublimate desire for social and romantic interaction into their career activities and to share common experiences with colleagues, friends and family.

The other side of the coin, however, is the sometimes prodigious tendency of Cancer III's to indulge in excess. Although they may deal with their needs well, their desires and wants can easily get out of hand. Those born in this week do not always know when to stop, when to back off, when to let go. Obsessive-compulsive behavior is not at all uncommon among Cancer III's, whether related to self-gratifying activities that provide direct pleasure or to neurotic ones that only yield frustration. For this reason, some form of spiritual training is often essential for their development.

Their most successful relationships are often with colleagues rather than in personal or romantic settings, where their directness may prove too threatening to others. It also happens that they can best handle their intensity in their work, for in their private lives their direct expressions of energy may boomerang and cause personal difficulty.

As friends and family members, those born in the Week of the Persuader can be giving, sharing and affectionate. Yet their drive to control is evident here, too. Cancer III's do not hesitate to advise and to judge. Their instincts, fortunately, are often right on the mark, but by assuming a managerial role they often deny others the opportunity to guide their own destiny. In extreme cases, those born in this week can be insensitive and smothering, and their manipulations can wreak havoc on friends and intimates.

As spouses or lovers, Cancer III's often find it difficult to occupy anything but center stage. Not only must activities revolve around them, but they must take an active hand in shaping and forming whatever is going on. Conflicts often arise between these dominant individuals and those who question their authority. In such moments the most aggressive characteristics of Cancer III's are likely to emerge. Left alone to go ahead with their work and plans, however, which they usually see not as selfish but as intended for the good of the group, they are content, peaceful and even quiet in demeanor.

Is it possible or even desirable for Cancer III's to pursue long-standing, productive and satisfying love relationships? Yes, certainly, but their chances for success in such affairs are aided by good choices and sound judgment—which they too often allow to be impaired by the heat of their passions. In marriage or a permanent living situation, the answer is often a solid, practical partner, someone who lends structure and emotional stability.

CANCER III NOTABLES

A highly persuasive fellow, Bill Cosby talked his way from a North Philadelphia childhood to Temple University and onward, from standup comic to tv personality in I Spy and finally to

BILL COSBY

The Cosby Show, becoming the highest-paid male entertainer in America—all with a twinkle in his eye, and a powerful twinkle at that! Typical of Cancer III's, Cosby is comfortable dealing with the physical realities of life and has proven to be quite a businessman. Moreover, the intense Cancer III ambition in his case found laughter as its vehicle, and Cosby's ability to endear himself to his fans through both his feigned helplessness and his craftiness proved to be unbeatable. Few know the thoughts, hopes and dreams of the average person and the quirks of their individual personalities as well as Cosby.

From prisoner serving a life term to the presidency of his country, Nelson Mandela has never given up his intense love of his homeland. The smashing of apartheid by a strange alliance between F.W. de Klerk and Mandela (it was de Klerk who pardoned Mandela and released him from jail in 1990) signaled the entry of South Africa into the fold of democratic world powers. A master Persuader, Mandela never allowed himself to be talked out of his beliefs, even when he was offered his freedom if he did so.

NELSON MANDELA

Canonized by Pope Pius XII as the Heavenly Patroness of All Emigrants, Saint Mother Cabrini founded hospitals, schools, institutions and orphanages all over the world. Born in Italy, she was filled with the missionary spirit, and when she applied to Pope Leo XIII to work abroad, she was told that there was a great spiritual need on the part of Italian immigrants and others in the United States, to which she subsequently devoted herself. Four great hospitals were subsequently founded: two in Chicago, one in Seattle and the Columbia (Cabrini) Hospital in New York. A powerful Cancer III organizer and persuader, Mother Cabrini was able to put her ambition in the service of others.

CANCER-LEO CUSP

The Cusp of Oscillation

July 19–25

The Cancer-Leo cusp is an admixture of the fourth sign of the zodiac, Cancer, and the fifth sign of the zodiac, Leo. This cusp could be characterized as having an oscillating energy. The Cancer-Leo cusp can be symbolically likened to the period around twenty-eight years of age in the human life, and astrologically, this time marks the completion of one full cycle of the planet Saturn (which takes twenty-eight or twenty-nine years to return to the position in the zodiac it occupied at the time of one's birth). Both of these important planetary transits correspond to the point in human development when childhood, puberty, adolescence and young adulthood may be viewed for the first time in a historical context. Many people feel a need at this time to take stock of their lives—to evaluate them and to attempt to plan for the future. Often this is a time of identity crisis, and a time of change. Marriages, breakups, seeking new jobs, moving to another city or setting up a new house are often encountered here. The cyclic nature of the Cancer-Leo cusp underlines the oscillating energies found at this point in life, and the uncertainties and indecisions which manifest.

Those born on the Cancer-Leo Cusp show both the watery and receptive influences of the moon and the fiery, aggressive characteristics of the sun. Of all twelve cusps, this one most clearly shows the split influence of two adjacent signs almost opposite in their orientations: traditionally feminine (moon) and masculine (sun) orientations are combined equally in a single personality. This means that men born on this cusp are likely to have strong feminine sensibilities and women an accentuated masculine side. Integrated in a single individual in this way, contrasting characteristics can result in a highly balanced and healthy personality. When they vie for ascendancy, however, producing wide swings of mood, they can cause great psychic stress.

Dramatic changes of affect in those born on the Cusp of Oscillation can make it hard for others to know how to approach them. Those who understand them will often ease into conversations with them slowly, sitting quietly with them until their mood becomes apparent.

It is generally difficult or impossible to push Cancer-Leos from one psychological state into another, for they are resistant to emotional manipulation. In their dealings with business partners and friends, they do best with people who are even in disposition and can promote a peaceful and constant environment in day-to-day relations. Steady jobs, steady relationships and a dependable mate are important in evening out their contrasting moods.

Cancer-Leos love being on the cutting edge of innovative projects and activities. Although they are not necessarily cut out to be leaders, their efficiency and their application to the task in front of them are admirable. They also know how to delegate authority and work with a team. Cancer-Leos usually prefer being in the thick of battle to sitting on the sidelines; those who can work with them, as true associates and partners, are often able to share such experiences with them, in this way penetrating deeply into their hearts and minds. It is essential to those born on the Cusp of Oscillation to work with people who are not only highly competent and can do their share of the work and more but who can understand them on a personal level.

“OSCILLATION”

Cancer-Leos have a dynamic side that can put them in situations of risk-taking and danger. Those born on this cusp generally crave excitement; whether in business, romance or free time, they need to meet challenges dauntlessly. Their calm under fire, their moral courage and their decision-making potential usually stand them in good stead in crises and emergencies, but their drive toward challenge periodically gets out of control. At work this can manifest as megalomania, or the desire to take on the world. In their leisure time, primarily driven by an unconscious drive for near-death experience, they may seek out activities like hang-gliding, river rafting or mountain climbing. They may also sublimate these extreme impulses into a hyperactive fantasy life that can only be satiated through action movies, adventure novels or video games, often in excessive quantity.

However, Cancer-Leos also tend to get emotionally blocked from time to time. In this state they may describe an inability to feel, a removal from the sensitive, empathic parts of themselves. This experience, usually manifesting as depression, can prove upsetting and frightening, particularly in adolescence and early adulthood. Obviously, those born on this cusp must walk a fine line to keep their psychological stability intact. On the one hand they need security in their surroundings and dependability in their relationships. Yet on the other hand they bore easily, and hanker for excitement, change and instability, which they often cannot handle, so that they go over the edge. Perhaps out of fear that their wildness will break out, they may impose restrictions on themselves that produce frustration and rigidity; yet too little self-discipline may result in excessive or addictive behavior and alarming mood swings. The most successful Cancer-Leos find the balance between security and uncertainty. Seeking the golden mean in all things may be the best solution for those born on this cusp. Professional counseling may also prove helpful.

In friendships, Cancer-Leos usually divide their energies equally between both sexes. And in their love relationships those born on the Cusp of Oscillation can express their desires over a wide variety of partner types. It is not that they are promiscuous, but that they have a wide palette of emotional and sexual expression. Many of them can be remarkably faithful to one or two mates, but if such relationships are to be successful, such partners must be able to hold their interest, in addition to being unusually accepting, open and understanding. Other Cancer-Leos may hang in there in stressful or marginally failed relationships with difficult and demanding individuals, meanwhile seeking pleasure and excitement elsewhere. In the end the best solution for Cancer-Leo is a close friend or understanding mate, one who is both psychologically perceptive and reassuring and who may be helpful during trying periods in getting Cancer-Leos through their difficulties.

The risk-taking, uncertainty and excitement of those born on the Cusp of Oscillation characterizes the life of aviatrix Amelia Earhart. Her sudden disappearance on one of the final legs of a transglobal flight continues to arouse excited controversy and heated debate. Earhart not only flew airplanes, she knew a great deal about their design and function and was an able mechanic. Although she also taught and wrote, it was the thrill of flying that drew her like a magnet. She established many aviation records, but the greatest lure of all was transoceanic flight. Only 7 years elapsed between her first transatlantic flight and her disappearance over the Pacific, but in this short span she captured the world's attention with her daring exploits.

During the legendary and exciting life of Ernest Hemingway, he was his own best publicist, not being content just to write about exciting contemporary events but insisting on participating in them. Often his characters were loosely veiled embodiments of his own activities, real or imagined, and through him the American public was educated about war and revolution in Europe, where Hemingway lived as an expatriate. African adventures were described in The Snows of Kilimanjaro, Caribbean ones in To Have and Have Not and, probably his finest work, The Old Man and the Sea. A typical Cancer-Leo, Hemingway suffered wide mood swings, oscillated between passivity and activity and exhibited both a strong masculine and feminine side.

Life was never dull for Rose Fitzgerald Kennedy. Married to a U.S. ambassador and self-made millionaire and mother to a U.S. president, attorney general and senator, life swirled around her, even in childhood. Coming from an extremely prominent Boston family, she married Joseph P. Kennedy and incurred the extreme disapproval of her family. Her deep spirituality enabled her to live through the assassinations of two of her sons as the grand matriarch of the Kennedy clan. Hanging in there in a difficult but exciting marriage, keeping her equilibrium through huge crises and keeping calm under fire mark Rose Kennedy as a Cancer-Leo.

LEO I

The Week of Authority

July 26–August 2

The Leo I period takes Authority as its central image. This period can be likened to the beginning of the mature adult life as an individual turns thirty. Confidence can run high at this point if the doubts and uncertainty of the first Saturn return (age twenty-eight or twenty-nine) have been resolved. Beginning the process of establishing oneself as an authority in a given field can be a focus at this time and an absorbing task. Some must assume the role of authority to their growing children, while others may look to an older, more experienced person who can serve as a teacher, a guide who can initiate them into a broader understanding of the world. Other Leo I's may strengthen their sense of confidence through what they learn from books, religious or spiritual teachings, philosophy, etc.

The days that comprise Leo I symbolically reveal the mature adult developing a truly original style, making important decisions for him/herself and the family or work group, and in general trying to be successful in life by making his/her name known and trusted.

Among the most powerfully authoritative of the year, Leo I's are intense, hard-driving individuals, dedicated primarily to their own personal activities, growth and development. Asserting themselves and being taken seriously is what appeals to them. Also, much of their energy is channeled inward rather than outward, toward developing their own strengths and abilities. Yet they do not view themselves as the be-all and end-all either—far from it. They believe in ultimate higher authorities, which they worship and serve: usually the abstract truths and principles embodied in the practice of their principal endeavor, whether it lies in the arts, business, sports or philosophy. Although they have their heroes, it is usually to these principles rather than to people that they accord the highest value.

Many Leo I's can be highly competitive, and geared to coming out on top. Others don't really care that much for worldly success, being more interested in bettering their own personal best. It may be difficult for Leo I's to work for a boss, especially one they do not respect. Yet when they run their own company or business, they also encounter problems, since their capacity to dominate is often greater than their capacity to lead. They may work most easily with people who have been drawn to them as admirers, students or disciples; then the relationship is clear from the start. Another solution can be working on their own, perhaps as freelancers. Leo I's can best become team players with co-workers and associates when it is clear that they are all working together for a common, usually higher cause.

Leo I's are highly physical individuals, magnetically drawn to exciting and confrontational experiences. Those born in this week need to prove themselves repeatedly, whether in the sports arena, the wild world of nature, the jungle of corporate finance or the intimacy of the bedroom. So intense is this area of their personality that intimates and enemies alike may feel a bit ignored, for much of their striving is impersonal in nature, and basically an expression of the Leo I will to overcome. Even in more mundane, everyday activities, mates and lovers periodically feel the Leo I's detachment.

Being involved with such individuals is rarely an easy task. Their standards for themselves are extremely high, and they too often want others to show a similar intensity and devotion. In the end, however, they usually do expect more of themselves than of others, and do show an understanding of their colleagues' and intimates' limitations. Realistic Leo I's will not have disproportionately high expectations of co-workers and mates but will only expect the best of which they are capable. This in itself can be a heavy enough load for them to bear.

Leo I's can make loyal and faithful friends. It is usually only from such intimates that a Leo I can accept advice, particularly of a personal nature. Leo I's will not usually accept help from a colleague, professional counselor or stranger. Perhaps once in a lifetime, however, those born in the Week of Authority may put themselves in the hands of another person to whom they ascribe almost godlike status, often a kind of teacher or guru. Such trust is not given easily, and should it fail, tremendous disillusionment will surely follow.

Most of those born in the Week of Authority would do well to work on their treatment of their fellow human beings, particularly in the areas of kindness, patience and understanding. Those involved with these tough customers must themselves be prepared to show these three traits in abundance. When the high expectations of Leo I's are not met, they can become unusually frustrated and bitter. Also, they do not react well to negativity, nagging and constant criticism. Those who live and work most successfully with Leo I's, then, are those whose attitudes are open, determined and optimistic.

Family life works out for some Leo I's; for others it is a great mistake. Rarely, however, does a Leo I deeply need it. Should they choose to be parents, they will have a lot to give; they have much to teach, are protective and inspire confidence. But their children and mates must quickly come to appreciate their need for their own space, and for time away from home. Trying to get the undivided attention of a Leo I can be a frustrating experience. Too often their idea of caring and attention may be limited to intense encounters, rather than steady displays of understanding and sympathy.

As lovers, Leo I's are usually passionate rather than sensuous. They may also exhibit a certain detachment, or a preoccupation elsewhere. Predictable and routine circumstances often dull sexual gratification for those born in this week. More often than not, their most pleasurable sexual experiences come not with their mates or partners but in casual, chance encounters, or in clandestine affairs of longer standing. Successful spouses of Leo I's know how to keep the romantic flame alive through a combination of variety, skill and imagination.

Leo I's must learn to relax and have fun or risk burnout. Those who can seduce them away from their work and their intense preoccupations will play important roles in their lives. Casual friends who can do this often experience the best that those born in this week have to offer.

ADVICE:

Learn to accept people as they are—both the positive and negative. It is probably useless to try to camouflage yourself, but do try to be more diplomatic and sensitive. Although you are good at making decisions for others, you may have overlooked making some crucial decisions for yourself. It doesn't make you less of a person to be a bit more easygoing.

LEO I NOTABLES

Swiss psychoanalyst Carl G. Jung had an enormous influence on popular, esoteric and intellectual thought in the second half of the 20th century. Overshadowed by his more empirical and pragmatic colleague, Sigmund Freud, Jung broke with him in 1913 to develop his own school of psychiatry. Jung became the Authority in such areas as the human personality and the study of symbols, partly by creating links between our dream world and the myths and icons found the world over in ancient and so-called primitive societies. From astrology to semiotics, from cultural anthropology to afterlife experience, Jung's theories have helped to unravel hitherto unsolved metaphysical puzzles.

With the determination and drive of a true Leo I, Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis married one of the world's most powerful and then one of the world's richest men—John F. Kennedy and Aristotle Onassis, respectively. Quite successful careerwise, socially and financially both before and after she met both, Jackie never really depended on anyone to make her life a full one in worldly terms. One of the world's most photographed women, it was difficult for Jackie to take a step without a horde of photographers buzzing around her, and an already tough stance toward publicity only intensified over the years. Self-preservation is an instinct strongly at work in those born in the Week of Authority, and Jackie was no exception.

JACQUELINE KENNEDY
ONASSIS

Dada painter and assembly artist Marcel Duchamp startled the art world with his controversial Nude Descending a Staircase. Greatly expanding the vocabulary of modern art, Duchamp moved from his Cubist and Futurist beginnings to explore more distant artistic horizons, particularly after founding the New York Dada movement. Painting, poetry, film and sculpture took on new meaning in his hands. His hard-driving approach to further his own personal development and his devotion to the highest principles of his art identify him as a Leo I. Tough and uncompromising, Duchamp was only able to work with others whose depth of commitment, technical mastery and understanding matched his own. His drive for perfection led him to largely give up art for chess in his later years.

LEO II

The Week of Balanced Strength

August 3–10

The Leo II period takes Balanced Strength as its central image. This period symbolizes a time in the adult life when the need to adopt a heroic, protective, or nurturing stance comes to the fore. Usually such feelings emerge in family situations or in work with social groups. Adopting and playing a role fully is important at this time and to that extent, taking life seriously. Showing the courage to stand up for one's convictions and not forsake one's ideals no matter what are characteristic of this period.

The days that comprise Leo II symbolically reveal the mature adult developing poise and composure, maximizing effectiveness, exerting both power and influence in a variety of social roles, and commanding respect. Assertiveness, honor, dignity and faithfulness are qualities stressed here.

Solid and tough, Leo II's do not back down from challenges; in fact, they thrive on them, and are often at their best when facing problems and difficulties. Although drawn toward experiences that hold an element of danger, they are usually not foolhardy enough to attempt the impossible. Realists, they are well aware of their limitations, which they may stretch to the limit if necessary but will rarely try to overleap. Fixed attitudes characterize those born in this week, so it will take a great deal of patience and persistence to get them to change their mind. Leo II's pride themselves on their ability to spot phoniness and nonsense, and are particularly critical of metaphysical ideas not strongly grounded in the here and now they may lose the peripheral vision necessary for keeping in touch with their surroundings. In a related problem, their reliance on logical reasoning can detract from what may well be their best suit—that is, their capacity for strong hunches and their intuitive strengths. These traits may lead them to get out of touch with reality while at the same time remaining convinced of their rightness—a dangerous combination.

Leo II's generally exercise tremendous powers of concentration, but through their fixation on their object

Gifted with endurance and tenacity, Leo II's hang in there for the duration. The upside of this character trait is their intense loyalty and devotion; the downside is a streak of masochism—a tendency, for example, to suffer while trying to hold a romance, marriage or business together. Leo II's can continue in an unhappy or stressful relationship for years without undue complaint, patiently seeking ways to make it work. Although they would sometimes do better by quitting, they will usually refuse to take the easy way out, and they may have little respect for those who lack their level of commitment. When long-standing relationships that have proven unsatisfactory finally do collapse, perhaps due to a stroke of fate, or to the partner's unwillingness to continue, Leo II's have a tendency to sink into depression. Too often they blame themselves. A long period of grieving may be necessary before they are once again able to function well.

They can certainly be their own worst enemies. Those born in the Week of Balanced Strength exude power and self-confidence when their prodigious energies meld, but these same energies also get out of control and can threaten to tear them apart. At such times they make a piteous sight. Alcohol or drug binges and borderline or outright criminal activities can all be the evidence of Leo II energies run amok. Keeping balanced is less an ideal for them to attain than an absolute condition for their healthy survival. The children and friends of Leo II's can be severely jolted if these normally reassuring presences disintegrate. Thus the Leo II desire to be a protector of the weak and a friend to the underdog can backfire.

Those born in the Week of Balanced Strength do well in highly structured situations of their own making, situations in which they are at the helm. They periodically feel an acute need to withdraw into a private place, however, and sometimes to a strictly isolated one. The problem here is an accompanying tendency to nurse hurts and slights, and in extreme cases to manifest paranoia. Developing an accepting attitude and working to diminish dogmatic and intolerant thought are essential to their mental health.

For the most part, Leo II's are extraordinarily faithful people. They see themselves as champions of the downtrodden and protectors of the weak. They despise exclusion and condescension and, for this reason, generally side with the common person rather than the privileged. It is not that they do not have an ability to mix well with a variety of social classes; rather, they dislike insincerity or pretension.

In their toughness, Leo II's are able to withstand many disappointments. They usually weather the storm and win out through knowing how to wait, "having the long breath." They like being independent, but nonetheless tend to build a well-defined life in which they exert maximum power with a minimum of fuss.

Those involved with Leo II's, whether as co-workers, employees, family, mates or friends, know that those born in this week must not be pushed or prodded when in a negative frame of mind but, rather, must be left alone to work things out for themselves. Leo II's are also sometimes accused of insensitivity. This is more often a result of their being preoccupied than of a lack of understanding on their part, for many born in this week are psychologically astute; yet although they can comprehend another person's emotional state, they may feel no need to sympathize with it. Leo II's are not especially empathic with those around them, and are capable of a stony detachment. Many born in this week find emotional matters simply too messy to get involved in, a response that is sometimes traceable to unpleasant childhood experience. When the parent, child or lover of a Leo II is of a more feeling type, conflict can result.

Being straightforward and unpretentious themselves, Leo

II's dislike people who put on airs. Nothing excites their often uncontrollable temper more than insincerity, lying or disingenuousness. Leo II anger and hotheadedness can weaken the psychological balance on which their strength depends. Those closest to these intense individuals know how to use sensual persuasion and a fun-loving outlook to keep their partners happy.

ADVICE:

Watch your temper. Hotheadedness can throw you off balance and aid your opponent. Compromise and diplomacy are virtues to be cultivated, not weaknesses to be despised. Remain open and vulnerable to love. Don't be too hard on yourself, or too demanding. Ease up a bit on the expectations you place on others.

LEO II NOTABLES

Not even the Beatles were able to produce seven #1 hits in a row—but Whitney Houston did. The enormously successful and talented Houston specializes in firsts, such as being the first female recording artist to enter the charts with an album at #1 or having her first film, The Bodyguard, be a box office hit. Keeping her balance has not always been easy for Whitney, but as a Leo II she thrives on challenge, like keeping her marriage with unpredictable Bobby Brown afloat. However, in all areas of life, suffering and a refusal to back down or admit defeat are also Leo II characteristics that Whitney will have to be careful do not turn into sheer masochism.

Thinking of basketball's New York Knicks without Leo II Patrick Ewing is like trying to imagine a peach without a pit. The durable and powerful center of the Knicks' attack personifies the Balanced Strength of the team. Quiet and controlled on court, Ewing does his job without a lot of fuss or bother in a sport more devoted each year to the cult of personality. To call him a workhorse is to state the obvious, but there are few players who give their all with more dignity.

Despite a long film history, director John Huston has never received the homage he deserved, largely due to the disappointing quality of many of his films and also because of a 20-year gap in his career between 1953 and 1973. But the man who directed The Maltese Falcon and then went on to do The Treasure of the Sierra Madre, The African Queen and The Man Who Would Be King can hardly be ignored in film history. Huston led an exciting and varied life in which the physical Leo II nature expressed itself, whether he was working as a professional boxer or a lieutenant in the Mexican cavalry. Huston was also an actor, like his father, Walter, and like his daughter, Anjelica is.

LEO III

The Week of Leadership

August 11–18

The Leo III period takes Leadership as its central image. This period can be likened to a time in the prime of one's life when the right combination of experience, enthusiasm, energy and knowledge can make one a strong candidate for positions of responsibility. Perhaps for the first time, taking over the reins of a business, club or family and leading it to new heights can seem natural and appropriate. Such a leadership role may be a proving ground for assuming even greater roles of this sort later in life—for example, when a manager becomes a partner or owner, or a parent becomes a patriarch or matriarch.

The days that comprise Leo III picture the adult validating his/her skills and experience, learning when to rely on conventional wisdom and when to take risks, and discovering the most effective way to galvanize a team and lead it effectively, inspirationally and tirelessly.

Leo III's often assume a commanding role in their family and social or work group. They have highly developed instincts to lead, but not necessarily to dominate or to rule; it is simply that action comes naturally to these dynamic individuals. They are also good planners, well capable of organizing an effective plan of attack and seeing it through. Building an effective team is essential to their continued success, and learning to delegate authority is key to stopping them from shouldering unrealistic burdens alone, which can result in burnout or breakdown.

Both men and women born in this week have a heroic view of themselves. Aggressive, Leo III's know what they want and how to get it. They may lack consideration for the wishes of others, arousing antagonism and getting them in trouble, particularly since they are not, in fact, insensitive to what others are feeling but may choose to ignore what they know and follow their own desires. By occasionally riding roughshod over the emotions of those in their lives, they arouse resentment, fear and anger. But those born in this week may also inspire tremendous loyalty, respect and love in others, so much so that their acquaintances and friends often overlook the more selfish elements of the Leo III character.

Those born in the Week of Leadership have an overwhelming faith in their own abilities. In extreme cases they see themselves as infallible, and seek to project a godlike demeanor. Obvious problems may result from this egotistical stance, not the least of these being the loss of faith that can be engendered in their children, mates and co-workers when they get tripped up. The fall from grace that inevitably follows may result in deep disillusionment; this can impair the relationship permanently, but it can also lead to a more realistic view of the Leo III personality.

Careerwise, Leo III's specialize in breathing new life into an ailing business or social or family group. Their prodigious energy and single-mindedness may be just what is needed to get things back on track. Those born in this week must see their endeavors bear fruit. Watching their restructuring and its implementation bloom is enormously satisfying to them; conversely, seeing their efforts fail is usually intolerable. Because Leo III's are not easily approached on an emotional level, striving shoulder to shoulder with them in such endeavors may be an effective means of getting close to them.

“LEADERSHIP”

Such working relationships may create deep ties of mutual feeling, which sometimes last a lifetime.

If those born in this week are to ground their self-image and bring themselves into closer everyday contact with others, it may be important for them to share quite menial tasks.

In particular, they will earn greater respect from family members if they shoulder ordinary, everyday responsibilities at home on a daily basis. A refusal or inability to “lower” themselves to this human level may result in tensions, frustrations and arguments. More balanced Leo III’s will avoid such needless difficulties by getting their chores done quickly and efficiently, with little fuss, thus freeing themselves up for what they view as more important endeavors.

The creativity of Leo III’s often runs high. Although they are capable of selfishness and narrowness in their personal dealings, in their careers their imagination, philosophical perspective, and wide range of expression often result in artistic, financial and social creations of a very high order. Many of their friends, acquaintances and co-workers, in fact, are not really so much enamored of the Leo III’s themselves as drawn to the aura surrounding them and the work they produce.

Other strong personalities inevitably clash with Leo III’s, and relationships with those born in this week are likely to be stormy affairs unless the other party is willing to compromise or back down. But the more clever, and devious, partners and mates of Leo III’s know exactly how to soothe the savage lion or lioness. Leo III’s are not unaware of their charisma, and consequently come to value the constant love and appreciation of that very special person. In fact, they may not actually be at all aggressive toward those they love. As long as they are honored and respected, they will be generous and kind, even to a fault: they will often refuse to see anything wrong in the behavior of a favored family member, a trait that can make them quite unrealistic. Having a thoroughly spoiled mate or child is a Leo III trademark. In love, Leo III’s are subject to sudden, explosive, violent and passionate displays of emotion. Their feelings are capable of smoldering under the surface for a long period only to break out unexpectedly and volcanically.

Those involved in love affairs with Leo III’s may appreciate their searing intensity and almost total involvement, but at the same time may have difficulty with their often overbearing, combative and unforgiving attitudes. In personal relationships, although faithful up to a point, Leo III’s are not particularly long-suffering, and will not hesitate to break things off if they are wounded or see little hope for the future. Coming to feel that they apply a double standard to their relationships, their partners, angry and disgusted, may rudely drop them, which can amaze the more unaware Leo III’—just when things were going so well! Indeed, Leo III’s may show little interest in seeing things from the other person’s point of view.

LEO III NOTABLES

A giant of a leader, although of diminutive size, Napoleon Bonaparte was the prototype of the Leo III personality. Frequently riding roughshod over the feelings and wishes of others, he nonetheless inspired worship and extreme loyalty in his followers. Napoleon's faith in himself and his ability to get his Corsican family and the French nation back on track further identify him as being born in the Week of Leadership. Known primarily for his military genius, Napoleon instituted social reforms that changed the face of France and of Europe in general, including a reworking of civil law, education, finance and administration. A revolutionary and true student of history, Napoleon is said to have created the beautiful, wide boulevards of Paris to make the erecting of barricades more difficult and, thus, his position more secure.

Superstar Madonna has captured the world's attention as much through her outrageous behavior as through her enormous talent. Dancer, model, singer, songwriter, actress, she has blazed a path across the entertainment firmament like few, if any, stars in recent years. Her challenge of social conventions, particularly those dealing with sex and the role of women, has made her a kind of unofficial social Leader for millions of fans and admirers worldwide. Typical of the Leo III personality, she has largely welcomed such a commanding role. Her stormy marriage to Sean Penn (also a Leo III) and other intimate relationships fit the Leo III mold of being passionate and tempestuous.

NBA All-Star Magic

Johnson has won the love and respect of the general public through his untiring efforts on behalf of the victims of AIDS. His life changed radically after he was diagnosed as HIV-positive, but he was able to translate his enormous leadership and team skills to the social arena as a spokesman for those with the disease. His achievements include being 3-time MVP and 9-time All NBA First Team, which attest to his fantastic playing ability and enormous popularity among players, fans and sports-writers alike. Magic's Leo III heroic and creative side, as well as his social commitment, are attested to by his Grammy-winning album What You Can Do to Avoid AIDS.

LEO-VIRGO CUSP

The Cusp of Exposure

The Leo-Virgo cusp is an admixture of the fifth sign of the zodiac, Leo, and the sixth sign of the zodiac, Virgo. This cusp can be likened to the period around thirty-five years of age in the human life and also to the actual time of year at which it occurs—the winding down of summer in the northern hemisphere. During this period of the year, grass must be cut to make hay for the winter, some vegetables harvested and others prepared for harvesting. The days grow shorter and the nights longer, fall approaches and vacation time is almost over. In human development, at the age of thirty-five, adulthood is in full swing. This is a period in which the theme of Exposure figures prominently—particularly in terms of personal development, career and family life. At this time an individual may discover and perhaps reveal to others secret or undiscovered parts of his/her personality. In doing so, new sources of power may be accessed while a sense of identity is strengthened. Both sexes reevaluate their marriages or ongoing relationships, and wish to bring hidden matters out in the open for discussion. Unattached individuals may seek to define a more meaningful living situation for themselves.

Those born on the Leo-Virgo cusp are an interesting blend of introvert and extrovert. Leo-Virgo people combine the practical, earthy qualities of Virgo with more intuitive, fiery traits of Leo, producing quietly inspired individuals who keep their light within. Some Leo-Virgos give a muted, almost nondescript first impression while concealing more flamboyant tendencies; others come across as exhibitionistic but are actually sensitive, private types. They may hide certain personal qualities, or facts about themselves, for years, but their inner flamboyance will break out periodically in even the most introverted of those born in this period when one day they reveal themselves to the world, in full awareness of what they are doing. Many of them will come to realize that self-concealment is futile the more they try to hide, the more the world seems to take notice of them. By aiming to be more transparent, letting others see what they really are instead of hiding, Leo-Virgos will even out some of their swings between introverted and extroverted behavior.

Leo-Virgos born in unremarkable surroundings, or at the bottom of the social ladder, can be late starters in the struggle to move up in the world. Even once they get going, it is only through tremendous tenacity and willpower that they can maintain their momentum. Indeed, many born in this week can succumb to their worst fear, a life of boredom and mediocrity. Their belief in themselves is often inversely proportionate to the world's belief in them; just when they are gaining self-confidence, in other words, others take less notice of them.

While applause is not crucial to Leo-Virgos, who do not need attention in the same way as many born in other periods of the year, no matter how quiet or self-contained Leo-Virgos may be, they have a burning sense of their own worth. It is characteristic of them not to reveal the truth about themselves or show their real inner feelings until they get to where they are headed, socially or professionally. In fact, this desire to divulge, to show, can be the fuel that powers their drive toward a goal. Those who do reach the top and have carried lifelong secrets are prone to be found out, but usually through their own statements and behavior. This tendency can be viewed as a strange blend of narcissism and masochism, of self-indulgence and punishment.

Those born on the Cusp of Exposure are often outstanding observers and judges of character. They know how to watch, silently, without drawing attention to themselves. Further, they are often good at recording their impressions in thought or word, and at expressing them later after long periods of rethinking. Their associates and co-workers will often come to depend on their memory, judgment and objectivity. When able to achieve emotional stability, Leo-Virgos can be dependable and reliable friends.

Leo-Virgos who use concealment and revelation alternately, as weapons or as ploys to get their way, must come to realize the childishness and nonproductivity of such games. Often the solution to such problems comes when they meet just one person, or a very few, who can accept them exactly as they are; through acceptance, love and trust, they can eliminate the need for hide-and-seek. Emotional immaturity may plague those born on this cusp until they fully accept the challenges of growing up.

People who like mysteries and detective work will like Leo-Virgos, and those who take the trouble to understand them will be richly rewarded. Although Leo-Virgos do not deeply need appreciation, kudos or flattery, they do cry out for understanding. This silent call is heard only by those sensitive enough to take notice, on a deep level, of those born on the Cusp of Exposure.

Trust is obviously a big issue for those born on the Cusp of Exposure: their friends must be trustworthy enough to keep their secrets, and their lovers must be trusted to be faithful. Those born in this week do not easily attach their passion and affection to someone. If betrayed by a friend or lover, a Leo-Virgo may suffer emotional collapse.

Characteristically, Leo-Virgos form long-lasting relationships with those who first penetrate their shield of mystery. Those who can accept the fully revealed Leo-Virgos, continuing to like them even after they show more of themselves, become their closest, life-long friends and partners. Leo-Virgos may not make the best parents or the best children. Their private nature can make intergenerational sharing difficult or impossible. There may well be a family member, however, a cousin or sibling, to whom they periodically open their hearts and with whom they share their secret worlds. Such peers are valuable role models for possible mates later in life; indeed, Leo-Virgos may often cast their life partners in the role of brothers and sisters. Although usually far too self-centered, secretive and unattached to sacrifice themselves for family life, Leo-Virgos can be counted on to discharge their obligations in the daily living situation, as long as the demands placed on them are not excessive.

LEO - VIRGO CUSP NOTABLES

U.S. President Bill Clinton is not an easy personality to fathom. Characteristic of those born on the Cusp of Exposure, he chooses to hide or reveal just as much as suits him at the time. Although an intensely private person, he gives the impression of extreme sociability and openness but in fact may keep much to himself. An observer, Clinton has learned much in life from watching and waiting, rather than heedlessly plunging in headfirst. Thoughtful, he knows when to compromise and even how to baffle his opponents by adopting their own stance rather than opposing them. Even when neglected or overlooked in his youth, Clinton, like other Leo-Virgos, carried within him a burning sense of his own importance, which he knew one day he would impress on the world.

When liberated woman Gabrielle "Coco" Chanel opened her first shop in Paris in 1914, she filled it with unisex clothes made from army-navy materials, an innovation that was at least 50 years ahead of its time. When she launched Chanel No. 5 perfume in 1921, she was again in the forefront. The point is that Chanel did manage to put sex appeal in a bottle and sell it—on her own terms and in her own way. Chanel never made a fashion statement just for the sake of making it or because she needed to. Patiently, she would wait until she had something significant to say—like many Leo-Virgos.

GABRIELLE "COCO"
CHANEL

Chanel was never in any hurry to show her stuff and in fact lived to be 88 years old.

Before Sean Connery started as an actor, he had been a coffin-polisher, swimsuit model and bodybuilder, representing Scotland in the Mr. Universe contest (1950). His first acting job, in the chorus of the London production of South Pacific (1951), led to small and medium parts in repertory, tv and film. But it wasn't until 1962 that Connery reached prominence as James Bond in Dr. No. His wit, charm and virility brought him instant stardom—and he went on to make six other Bond films. But over the years Connery wasn't satisfied with his constant identification as the sexy-spy Bond character. Characteristically a Leo-Virgo, he knew he had much more to offer as an actor. Using his superstar power, he carefully chose a wider range of roles—gradually establishing himself as a well-rounded performer in such films as The Name of the Rose (1986; British Film Academy award), The Untouchables (1987; Best Supporting Actor Oscar) and The Hunt for Red October (1990). Connery knew that eventually he'd be recognized as the versatile artist he truly is.

VIRGO I

The Week of System Builders

August 26–September 2

The Virgo I period takes System Builders as its central image. This period can be likened to the time in a person's life when the instinct to consolidate and solidify existing structures, marriages or partnerships, businesses, etc., asserts itself. Also, at this time, many individuals take part in service-oriented activities, whether in their family, professional or social life. The desire to be helpful and to constructively influence the course of events manifests here.

The days that comprise Virgo I symbolically reveal the mature adult beginning to apply his/her energies in the service of social ideals, perhaps working with and supporting a partner, building dependability and efficacy, and taking a more no-nonsense and businesslike attitude toward the world. This may indeed be a time when overly carefree or irresponsible individuals recognize it is time to clean up their act.

Structure is an important theme in the lives of Virgo I's, a kind of insurance policy they inevitably fall back on in times of stress. It underlies many of their attitudes toward the world. Mental insistence and concentration are often their greatest strengths, and consequently they suffer most when emotional pressures leave them unable to think clearly or manage their affairs well. They are particularly upset by chaos, so building an effective daily routine, a practical home, or an efficient work space is essential to their mental health. Inflexibility or rigidity is also a possible outcome of such structuring, however, and must be guarded against.

The careers of Virgo I's often involve service. In their family role, similarly, they often care for those who need help, or provide the bulwark of dependability in everyday life. Not all Virgo I's are well cast in such roles, however, and despite their tendencies and talents to help others, they can find themselves resenting heavy responsibilities loaded on their backs. Although those born in the Week of System Builders seem to do well living and working with people who know how to cooperate and to share the burdens of everyday life, it cannot be assumed that they want to be team players. Virgo I's need to spend a lot of time alone, and do best when their contributions to the well-being of a social or family group are made on their own terms.

Virgo I's are not usually cut out for solo leadership roles, but they can make excellent partners and co-workers. They like to sit back and watch, preferring to observe carefully before acting; this quality of objectivity, and the evaluations that result from it, can make them extremely valuable to a company or family. Writing reports, stating conclusions verbally, and chronicling in different media what they see around them are often some of their best-developed abilities.

Women born in this week can have a shy, demure appeal; male Virgo I's are often taken for strong, silent types. Rather than acting aggressively, Virgo I's typically prefer to be discovered by others. This behavior is powerfully ingrained, since they thereby avoid rejection and reinforce their power to choose. In fact, choice is crucial to Virgo I's if they are to feel empowered. Yet they are capable of making unfortunate choices in lovers and friends—in personal matters their decisions are sometimes disastrous. Their objectivity about the world does not involve a corresponding realism about and awareness of their own emotions. Consequently, Virgo I's can suffer from acute nervous instability and depression when they meet disappointment. Feelings of inadequacy or failure are prone to surface and can prove to be too much for them to handle.

Virgo I's tend to be fixed in their mental attitudes, and this is likely to arouse antagonism, particularly from those who prefer a more spontaneous, flexible or free-flowing lifestyle. As dominant family figures or parents, those born in this week may be prone to making excessive numbers of rules, and to enforcing them overdiligently. Should they believe that people must be free to choose and act according to their own dictates, on the other hand, they may implement such beliefs with equal zeal. Virgo I's may benefit from personal involvements or working relationships with more easygoing types, who just take things as they come without needing to rely on planning them out in advance.

Since learning to loosen up is essential for Virgo I's, their best relationships are often with those with whom they can just let go and have a good time. These relationships with fun-loving types can prove mutually advantageous, with the Virgo I's providing structure and dependability, the other party the unserious, relaxed attitude that those born in the Week of System Builders may lack. In love relationships, alas, Virgo I's may not prove so dependable, for if their emotional state is unsettled they can feel they have little to give. Seeking to withdraw, they become unable to cope with the other person's feelings.

Virgo I's themselves can encounter problems when their service-oriented stance and practical abilities attract dependent, needy types, who drain their energies and exhaust their capacity to give. Fostering such dependencies may be a subtle form of self-destructive behavior for them, for although the need to share and to solve problems may initially provide positive common bonds, relationships with insecure and needy individuals can ultimately bring out a corresponding negativity in those born in this week.

Since living through others may be a temptation for Virgo I's, they must learn to stand up for themselves and become less self-sacrificing. Building a truly independent lifestyle, one less dependent on the needs and wishes of others, whether parents, clients, friends or lovers, may be the greatest challenge they face. In the long run, then, close relationships with highly independent people, particularly those who can demonstrate how to set limits in human interactions, may prove the most productive and rewarding for them. Even if such personalities initially seem selfish or egotistical, they are especially beneficial to Virgo I's as role models. Those born in this week may need to free themselves from the constant demands of other people if they are to gain the space they need to develop their own expressive, creative and financially productive side.

ADVICE:

Soften your stance a bit—take things as they come and let them go as they will. Try to keep your work and home life separate. Step out a bit and demand dependability from others, too. Protect yourself from hangers-on and parasites. Occasionally be more selfish and unashamedly demand benefits for yourself.

VIRGO I NOTABLES

The overwhelming beauty of Ingrid Bergman in no way overshadowed her intelligence and great mental strength. Characteristic of Virgo I's, she depended on structure and stability in her private life to be able to perform at her best, and, consequently, when as a married woman she fell in love with director Roberto Rossellini, her career took a nosedive. She made 6 films and had 3 children with the Italian director, including actress Isabella Rossellini. During this time she was barred from making films in the U.S. for 7 years. In her most famous role, opposite Humphrey Bogart in Casablanca, she is caught between her love for her husband and her lover and becomes unhinged when her rational and emotional sides come into conflict.

The German poet Johann Wolfgang von Goethe has always been pictured as his country's Universal Man. As a scientist, linguist, lawyer, critic, philosopher, painter, poet, novelist and playwright of the 18th and 19th centuries, there were few areas that escaped Goethe's keen interest. Evident in all his work is the love of system and structure that identifies him as a Virgo I, especially in his scientific works, such as The Metamorphosis of Plants.

Goethe was also very interested in the occult and in its complex hierarchies, which he put to artistic use in his greatest work, Faust. A strange blend of Classical, Gothic, Renaissance and Romantic, Goethe's literary work is regarded stylistically as some of the most beautiful and elegant ever written in the German language.

JOHANN WOLFGANG

Possibly the single greatest domination of any sport by an individual was that of Edwin Moses over a 10-year span, in which he was undefeated as a hurdler in 122 races. To think of coming in first, second or third in several international events is in itself mind-boggling, but to never be less than first through national, international and Olympic track events in over 100 starts against the best in the world, under every condition, is almost inconceivable. Always in top physical condition, Moses was also very disciplined mentally, like many Virgo I's. Analytical and articulate, with an almost professorial attitude toward his work, Moses studied the technique and physiology of hurdling in great detail.

VIRGO II

The Week of the Enigma

September 3–10

The Virgo II period takes The Enigma as its central image. According to The Grand Cycle of Life, in human terms, this period falls at the close of one's thirties, when for many people there comes a serious realization that they are no longer young, and that it may be necessary to reevaluate their life. Thus many difficult and puzzling aspects of existence are symbolized by this period. The feeling that youth has flown brings to mind serious issues, usually of a personal nature, and a need to solve one's psychological problems or change one's ways may be felt. Ethics, morals and resolutions to better oneself all play their role here.

The days that comprise Virgo II symbolically reveal the mature adult breaking away from previous systems or modes of living in order to build imaginatively, seek greater success using intelligent means, and fathom the mysterious, enigmatic and problematical side of the self. The attainment of private goals now assumes a high priority.

Virgo II's are puzzling individuals, often proving difficult even for those closest to them to figure out. Their faces do not easily reveal what they are really thinking; indeed, showing emotion can be difficult for them. Behind their attractive or impressive exterior may lurk an unexpectedly guarded individual. Sphinx-like, Virgo II's are not above constructing devious defenses and cultivating an air of mystery about themselves and what they do. They sternly resist attempts to analyze them, and often make it clear that they are in no way interested in discussing their personal or family life. The reason for this is seldom insecurity, but showing vulnerability can be a problem for Virgo II's, and can keep other people from getting really close to them. So strong is the belief of Virgo II's in their own individuality that some of them will put themselves above accepted social codes. Such people can become isolated and lonely, appearing unapproachable. Those born in the Week of the Enigma are blessed with great inner strength. Many Virgo II's inspire confidence in others, and they may often be called upon to help out or take charge. Yet those born in this week can find it difficult to respond when high expectations are placed on them. Their natural tendency at such moments is to withdraw into their private, often secretive world.

Communication can be a top priority for Virgo II's, particularly in their career, and as a means of clarifying their own thoughts. But they may find it hard to share more personal experiences. This is due less to a lack of verbal ability than to a need to keep their inner struggles to themselves, and to undergo their trials alone. Many Virgo II's are kind, thoughtful, considerate people who see no need to bother those around them with their difficulties. Asking for help may be a real problem for them; they seem fated to work things out alone. Many of those born in this week are true believers in doing the right thing. For these highly ethical individuals, human beings gain in moral stature through individual effort.

Virgo II's have a zany side, and love humor in many forms. They can sometimes look foolish and naive, but they are usually able to see their faults, and to laugh at themselves. Carried too far, this attitude can result in a low self-image, but for the most part the ability of Virgo II's to joke about themselves is a sign of strength rather than weakness. For all their practicality in everyday matters, those born in this week lead a rich fantasy life, which complements their comic sense. Even the most dour and serious of Virgo II's has a wry sense of humor, perhaps a bit bitter or sarcastic at times, but nevertheless funny.

Virgo II's are discriminating types who pride themselves on their good taste, in people as well as in intellectual matters. They have extremely high standards, which can lead them to reject other people as friends or to be rejected by them as overly picky. Their social circle consequently tends to be small. Critical but also honest, they invariably subject themselves to the same merciless criteria as they do others. Such attitudes certainly don't make them relaxed, and those born in this week can put themselves under enormous stress, which often leads to acute physical symptoms. More than with others in the year, organic illness in a Virgo II is often the result of psychic disturbance.

Behind their mask of confidence and their occasional bravado is an individual who needs love as much as we all do. Finding that special individual to whom they can open up (for Virgo II's, usually a friend rather than a lover) is often the first step toward unlocking their deepest sources of self-expression. For some, however, it will be a challenge to breach the defenses of Virgo II's, who may appreciate their efforts: lifelong friendships and even marriages can often result from such aggressive behavior. Those born in this week don't really mind others coming on to them, for they are quite confident of their ability to repulse any really undesirable attack. They also often enjoy being involved with active, outgoing types, who are a good foil to their thoughtful and at times withdrawn personalities.

The sexual expression of Virgo II's does not have to involve deep feeling. They have a curious way of throwing up invisible barriers between themselves and their lovers, and can detach themselves from the sexual act without being detected. Virgo II's often have a taste for the unusual in intimate relations. They may send out silent messages about this to their lovers, which, heeded, bring great satisfaction, but if ignored long enough can spell the end of the relationship. Blowing hot and cold, giving way to sudden, inexplicable fits of passion that quickly pass, is also a typical trait of those born in the Week of the Enigma.

Many Virgo II's have no real need to live with others, but if family life proves inviting they are capable of fitting in well, as long as they have enough time and space to themselves. As parents, their overexacting tendencies may have to be kept under control, and as mates their limited ability to accept the foibles of others will surely be put to the test. Through daily interactions with other people, at home and at work, those born in this week will deepen their own humanity. Being forced to strive with others to solve mutual problems will teach them about forgiveness, acceptance and sympathy.

ADVICE:

Try to maintain flexibility and acceptance without compromising your high standards. Open your heart in love relationships. Be aware of your condemning and unforgiving side. Gentleness, kindness and diplomacy are traits worth developing. Beware of putting yourself above the law or outside society. Don't be afraid to show your vulnerability.

VIRGO II NOTABLES

A mother of 10 children who tended the farm and made potato chips, Grandma Moses began her painting career at age 78. She died at 101, and in the last 23 years of her life painted over 1,500 paintings. The subject of these naturalistic, primitive and childlike compositions were images and memories from her childhood and stories she had grown up with. An inexplicable phenomenon, like many Virgo II's, she was completely self-taught and was able to improve the quality of her work as the years went by. Seen the world over and highly prized by collectors, Grandma Moses was able to get only a few dollars for her paintings while she was alive. A puzzling exception in the world of art, Grandma Moses's artistic process has defied analysis.

GRANDMA MOSES

while she was alive. A puzzling exception in the world of art, Grandma Moses's artistic process has defied analysis.

Master of dialects and accents, comedian and film actor Peter Sellers was also a master of disguise. In real life few penetrated his mask of secrecy, and even his family could not claim to really know him. Some felt that Sellers lacked any true identity, which explained why he could so easily impersonate others. In his many roles, from the president of the United States to a British lieutenant to an insane German scientist (all in one film, Dr. Strangelove), Sellers so identified himself with the character he portrayed that he merged with it. As with other Virgo II's, he was subject to short, unexplainable fits of passion, often manifested by falling in love with his leading lady (as with Sophia Loren) and wanting to give up his life and family for her.

PETER SELLERS

Tenor saxophonist Sonny Rollins is one of the leading exponents of technique on his horn after almost 50 years as a jazz musician. Rollins has recorded with every jazz great, including Charlie Parker, Thelonius Monk and Miles Davis, but perhaps was best when playing with his own group. His unaccompanied work in the 60s was often enigmatic and hard to follow, and like many Virgo II's, Sonny felt misunderstood. At one point he was overshadowed by the more popular John Coltrane. Effecting a kind of fusion between his more technical style and calypso and American dance music, Rollins later became much more popular with the general public.

More Virgo II's: Leo Tolstoy, Joseph P. Kennedy, Queen Elizabeth I, Louis H. Sullivan, Daniel H. Burnham, Louis XIV, John Cage, Otis Redding, Jean-Louis Barrault, Raquel Welch, Dweezil Zappa, Amy Irving, Charlie Sheen, Jane Curtin, Jane Addams, Buddy Holly, Paul Brown, Louise Suggs, Freddie Mercury, Richard I, Sid Caesar, Colonel Sanders, William Bligh, Margaret Trudeau, Karl Lagerfeld, Yma Sumac, Elvin Jones, Anton Dvorak, Grace Metalious, Patsy Cline, Anton Bruckner, Oskar Schlemmer.

VIRGO III

The Week of the Literalist

September 11–18

The Virgo III period takes The Literalist as its central image. In The Grand Cycle of Life, Virgo III can be compared to the time when a person turns forty and approaches the mid-life period. At this time the adult needs to grow ever more realistic and make hard choices—whether to opt for a big career change or continue in a long-standing position, realign relationships or make marital adjustments, and, for some women, to decide for the last time to have children or not.

The days that comprise Virgo III symbolically display the fully mature adult making vital decisions, developing a more fearless attitude and having the courage to go for what he/she really wants. Perhaps critical faculties and pragmatism are at their height during this time, but personal aspirations and needs should not be neglected, either. The days in this period stress the Virgo III's need to arrange things just as he/she sees fit, manipulating and ordering the environment to advantage.

The willful individuals born in the week of Virgo III generally persist until they get their way. Yet long periods may go by in which they refuse to take any sudden action. Their goals are so tangible to them, so real, that they may express their confidence in the final outcome through a kind of procrastination. Virgo III's know that a strong mental orientation can often have a decisive influence on the events unfolding around them.

Those born in the Week of the Literalist have a practical emphasis in their characters that can make them easily puzzled and even angered by irrationality. But since they usually control their feelings well beyond an immediate expression of irritation or disgust, it takes an especially annoying or upsetting stimulus to bring their true emotions to the surface. Even the more easily aroused Virgo III's usually mellow out with age. They feel emotion deeply, but may be stirred up only by the most personal encounters with lovers and mates. For the most part, those born in this week do not like emotional displays, particularly public ones, which they see as a sign of ostentation and a lack of self-control.

Virgo III's also dislike phoniness and pretension. Literalists, they like people to behave as they really are, and to be truthful to themselves, no matter how difficult this may be. On the other hand, Virgo III's do not like trouble or unpleasantness, and feel that a modicum of courtesy, consideration and gratefulness is demanded in almost any human situation. They are sometimes torn, then, between their love of truth and their need for harmony.

Virgo III's have a definite flair for the sensational. At times highly dramatic, those born in this week seek to uncover the truth and to reveal it to the world. Virgo III's can be fearless and courageous in confronting social mores, perhaps promoting ideals of free speech, free lifestyle and free love; revolutionary fervor often runs high in this group. They should not succumb, however, to the lure of sheer rebelliousness in their moral crusades. Otherwise calm, the passions of those born in this week ignite around a cause or an ideal more often than around a person.

Shrewd evaluative instincts are among the strongest suits of Virgo III's, but they must be careful not to let their acuteness in this area get out of hand.

“LITERALIST”

Professionally, they may be put into executive positions in which they are called upon to judge their colleagues on a daily basis, and in doing so they must try to be sensitive to the feelings of others, in whom they can easily engender feelings of rejection and disappointment. Resentment of those born in the Week of the Literalist may build to a pitch of negative energy that can become destructive and debilitating. Few achievements arouse the admiration of those born in this week more than the mastery of craft. Role models are thus extremely important to Virgo III's, and may prove a direct inspiration and stimulus for their own success. These Literalists can make excellent partners in creative, business and practical endeavors of all sorts, particularly when their partners are capable of producing high-caliber work. Virgo III's are able to put up with a lot, both in their career and in personal relationships, if the quality of their work or love life is high enough.

In relationships, Virgo III's are highly demanding, expecting the very best for themselves. Their lovers and mates will have to get tough in order to handle the energies of those born in this week, who, however, are often affectionate and caring people, particularly in times of adversity. Virgo III's have strong nurturing and protective instincts, which emerge strongly when their loved one is suffering or under attack. Extremely capable, they can keep troubled or problematic relationships alive for years through their perseverance and dedication. Facing and overcoming obstacles, in fact, can be a specialty of Virgo III's in all aspects of their lives. Their need for order and their striving for fulfillment usually find special satisfaction when a particularly challenging task or project is at last completed. Results are important to these pragmatic personalities, who are likely to lose interest or walk away when the fruits of their endeavors are regularly denied them.

Virgo III's have an ethical feeling about what they are entitled to, and may suffer terribly under unfair treatment.

Those born in this week must be careful not to succumb to selfish and manipulative drives. Friends, co-workers and employers may at times find them ruthless in cutting off personal and work relationships that no longer suit them. In the mind of the Virgo III, this is usually justified as realistic and fair, but it can also indicate a blindness in seeing the other person's point of view. More successful Virgo

III personalities will learn to bring relationships to a close more gracefully, without leaving a bad aftertaste.

The most positive human traits of Virgo III's often emerge in family life. They can make excellent parents and loving and dutiful children. For all of their independence and iconoclasm, Virgo III's are usually quite conventional in family matters, particularly enjoying holiday dinners and outings. Actually, those born in the Week of the Literalist have a great respect for authority, as long as it is honest, caring and just. All forms of favoritism, discrimination or unfairness in the treatment of children and parents are highly objectionable to Virgo III's.

ADVICE:

Try to be more sympathetic to the feelings of others. Not everyone is as strong-willed and directed as you. Don't get bottled up in your head; cultivating a love of food, sleep and sensuous activities is essential to the grounding of your energies. Do not hide behind or rely too heavily on those who would serve you.

VIRGO III NOTABLES

Critic and commentator on the American scene, H.L. Mencken was a true Literalist. Hopelessly devoted to the written and spoken word, Mencken wrote for the Baltimore Sun for much of his life but also published a considerable number of books on various topics. Probably the leading authority on the American language, Mencken was one of its staunchest defenders, particularly against those who felt the British owned English. Like many Virgo III's, Mencken's shrewd evaluative instincts were his strongest suit, but this frequently meant his becoming overly judgmental when voicing opinions, which he had on practically any subject.

"I want to be alone," said actress Greta Garbo, and one of the great careers in film ended. Although this famous line came from the film Grand Hotel, it was for many fans the only clue they could find for her permanent retirement from the screen at the age of 36. Garbo lived an incredible 49 years in self-imposed isolation while the world went its way and finally forgot her, although her image lived on. Her Virgo III coolness and objectivity are evident in most of her films, but when she lets herself go emotionally in Anna Karenina and Ninotchka, the screen explodes. Garbo's life illustrates how hardheaded Virgo III's can be when exercising their freedom of choice.

GRETA GARBO

One great inconsistency of D.H. Lawrence was that he tried to elevate the body and the soul in importance above the mind but in fact illustrates in almost every paragraph of his work what a cerebral Virgo III he really was. Born in the Week of the Literalist, Lawrence was never able to shake his strongly mental orientation, as much as he tried to drown it in torrents of feeling. In his third novel, Sons and Lovers, he reveals the struggles that were to occupy him for a lifetime, particularly his family triangle with a brutal coal miner father and a sensitive but psychologically beaten mother, whom he adored. Lawrence gave himself over to the feminine in his writing and thus had difficulty dealing with his own male side, which bound him the more tightly to his father.

VIRGO-LIBRA CUSP

The Cusp of Beauty

September 19–24

The Virgo-Libra cusp is an admixture of the sixth sign of the zodiac, Virgo, and the seventh sign of the zodiac, Libra. This cusp can be likened to the period around forty-two years of age in the human life. The time is marked by the fall equinox, when the length of days and nights is again equal. Astrologically, this time marks the completion of one and a half Saturn cycles. It has now come directly opposite its starting point. This Saturn transit is paralleled by Uranus having also moved to a position directly opposite that which it occupied at the time of birth.

Because the human life is taken ideally to equal eighty-four years (one Uranus cycle), forty-two years of age may be regarded as the midpoint in the cycle. At this time in life, a crossroads is often encountered (referred to as the mid life point) where people can become taken up with the pursuit of an ideal. Some at this time grow concerned with their own appearance (perhaps involving themselves in health or cosmetic treatments), and others seek to identify or associate with those who possess youth or physical attractiveness. Still others are able to discover a new, more mature ideal that is both profound and enduring. Accordingly, the days that comprise the Virgo-Libra cusp exemplify a search for beauty.

Those born on the Virgo-Libra cusp are fatally taken up with the pursuit of an ideal. Attracted to physical, sensuous beauty, whether in art objects, nature or people, the lure of color, shape, form, texture and the intriguing sound of music or a voice pushes all their emotional buttons and brings them creative inspiration. Influenced by the planets Mercury (ruler of Virgo) and Venus (ruler of Libra), those born on the Virgo-Libra cusp are extremely sensitive to external stimuli. They react strongly to unusual tastes and smells, and are easily jarred by disturbing sights and sounds. Those born on the Cusp of Beauty, then, must create a highly aesthetic environment for both their living situations and their work.

Virgo-Librans pride themselves on being up-to-date and aware of the latest trends in fashion, design, art and technology. Others may see their interests in these areas as merely trendy, but there is no denying that the information and taste of those born on this cusp can be extremely valuable to the organizations with which they are affiliated. Often, Virgo-Librans also have excellent executive, marketing and management skills, in which their sixth sense for current developments in their field stands them in good stead.

Because of their interest in the outward appearances of the physical world, Virgo-Librans may be seen as superficial and glitzy. Sooner or later in their lives, these individuals will have to address spiritual matters, for they usually discover at some point that their love of externals is an inadequate preparation for the more unpleasant, yet inevitable, aspects of life—disease, accidents, suffering, death. Classically, those born on the Cusp of Beauty will encounter one of these areas unprepared and will feel bewildered and inadequate. As a result, they will be impelled to scratch a bit deeper beneath the surface of existence.

Virgo-Librans are fun to have as friends. Imaginative and free-spirited, they lend life to any gathering. Yet those born on this cusp also have an emotional dark side, which their friends and mates have to cope with. In times of financial stress or emotional turmoil, addictive tendencies may surface, for Virgo-Libras have a tendency to turn to drugs and alcohol rather than encounter and overcome the vicissitudes of life head-on. It is here, in particular, that their sensuous nature can be most self-destructive. Those born on this cusp must also beware lest the healthy expression of their sexuality be sublimated into neurotic and possessive drives, in an attempt to flee from reality.

The most successful Virgo-Libras do not lose the common touch or forget their origins, no matter how humble. Yet those born on this cusp have a tendency to isolate themselves in an ivory-tower situation in which they become increasingly out of touch with the more basic aspects of their fellow human beings. This can work at cross-purposes with their ability to keep abreast of public taste, and it can undermine their usefulness. In extreme cases they may become snobbish and elitist, only associating with individuals they feel are worthy of their attentions, or through whose influence they can advance socially.

Heralding the arrival of autumn, the fall equinox takes place on the Virgo-Libra cusp, symbolizing the harvest.

Perhaps John Keats' poem "To Autumn" with its opening lines, "Season of mist and mellow fruitfulness, / Close bosom-friend of the maturing sun" best expresses the mood and images of this fecund period. The energy of those born on this cusp is indeed "mellow": they will avoid arguments, confrontations and unpleasantness in general whenever possible.

Lovers, co-workers and family members of Virgo-Libras know how sensitive they are to irritating or jarring elements in their immediate surroundings. Similarly, those born on the Cusp of Beauty usually require that the people with whom they choose intimate involvement are very good-looking. The one exception to this tendency occurs when Virgo-Librans themselves happen to be extremely attractive, in which case their partners can be of the most unusual physical types. Actually, those born on the Cusp of Beauty have an ambivalent attitude toward physical deformity in others, finding it both repugnant and fascinating.

Virgo-Libras may often make a connection with a stable and powerful figure as a mate or friend. Indeed, those born on this cusp may need to maintain a close partnership of some kind with such a dependable figure throughout their lives, if not in their personal lives then perhaps at work, with a co-worker or partner. However, these relationships are frequently affected by psychological projections of parents or family members.

Although Virgo-Librans periodically need to indulge their sense of touch, they may appear removed or untouchable themselves, and may only allow physical contact at special times. Many born on this cusp are content to admire beauty from a distance, seeing it as a quality to be adored or worshiped from afar, rather than one to approach or possess. Platonic relationships often have a special appeal for those born on the Cusp of Beauty.

VIRGO-LIBRA CUSP NOTABLES

Soul and rhythm-and-blues singer Ray Charles is still as much in love with music and performing as ever in his mid-60s. His highly sensuous approach to touch and sound marks him clearly as a Virgo-Libra cusp person. Blinded in his childhood by glaucoma, Charles is one of many musicians who have lived in a world where senses other than sight have been enhanced by loss of vision. Well known to the general public, Charles's career got a boost in 1980 when he made an appearance in the wild and wacky film Blues Brothers. His soaring and ecstatic style shows him totally surrendering to the electric flow of his music, particularly in songs like What'd I Say, which brought audiences to their feet dancing in the 50s and 60s.

Gorgeous Sophia Loren epitomizes the statuesque, earthy beauty symbolized by the Virgo-Libra cusp. Her highly sensuous qualities were apparent to producer Carlo Ponti, who picked her out of a beauty contest when she was 17 and launched her on her film career. Six years later Ponti (24 years her senior) married Sophia while his previous divorce was still being contested, setting off a furor in Italy and forcing the couple to move to France. The voluptuous Loren became an outstanding actress, her talent particularly evident in her roles opposite Italian star Marcello Mastroianni, and in 1961 she received an Oscar for best actress for her role in Two Women.

SOPHIA LOREN

Best-selling novelist, short-story writer and screenwriter Stephen King continues to top the charts year after year. King's ability to keep his finger on the public pulse, while taking a hand in defining taste through his works, characterize him as a Virgo-Libra cusp person. The darker side of King's character is also representative of those born on the Cusp of Beauty, but in his case, his works have provided a highly creative and lucrative outlet for his shadow. Although preferring relative isolation in his Maine home, King has never retreated to a snobbish ivory tower, a constant temptation for those born on this cusp. The gripping screenplays for The Shining and Misery, along with his successful serialization, The Green Mile, stand out as masterpieces.

LIBRA I

The Week of the Perfectionist

September 25–October 2

The Libra I period takes The Perfectionist as its central image. This period can be likened in human terms to the years just following the midlife point when a new determination to integrate, direct and perfect specific areas of one's life takes hold. The emphasis here is on self-improvement but also on the upgrading of one's lifestyle and social activities. Tending to problems, fixing things—in a word, maintenance—is particularly important at this time.

The days that comprise Libra I symbolically reveal the mature adult beginning to develop greater objectivity, verbal ability, application to his/her work, social skills and the patience needed to carry through on long-range projects. Ideally, the individual now faces challenges with steadfast determination and learns how to solve the technical and psychological problems of life more effectively.

Libra I's are often highly attractive personalities, yet they are not overly social ones. This can create problems for them, for although they have a great need to be in the limelight, they have a greater need to spend time alone. Many born in this week are not really cut out for public life at all, and some of them may give up a socially oriented career to spend more time on personal, private, anonymous enterprises. Indeed it is not at all uncommon for those born in this week to work a quite ordinary job, while devoting their real interest and energy to hobbies or other part-time endeavors.

Libra I's have perfectionist tendencies, which may infuse every area of their lives with a desire to find out what's wrong and to try to fix it. This theme of putting things right reflects their knowledge and technical know-how, and also their conviction that they know what's best for those around them.

In their drive for perfection, Libra I's are prone to apply their often mercilessly high standards equally to themselves and to those around them. At the heart of their perfectionism may well lie a voice from their childhood constantly telling them that they aren't good enough. Their critical attitudes can certainly run out of hand, and this can make them extremely difficult to live with. In areas of their daily lives, from the workplace to the kitchen to the bedroom, Libra I's may have checklists that they apply exactly, leaving little room for failure or neglect on the part of the other person.

Do not be surprised if the hunger for perfection of Libra I's sometimes drives them to become obsessive and compulsive. In an attempt to master their material, they may adopt overly rigid routines. Those involved with Libra I's on a daily basis will appreciate their savvy but may come to resent their inability to leave things alone. "If it's not broken, don't fix it" is a lesson that all born in this week will have to learn sooner or later.

Insecurity drives those born in this week to be over-achievers. They are extremely thorough in carrying out their plans, and in bringing their activities to a successful conclusion. Thus, while they are often seen as highly successful, those around them do not always appreciate how unsettled their inner life actually is. Their inflexibility in laying down rules for themselves, and their refusal to compromise their ideals, puts them under tremendous pressure, which may drive them equally to success or to despair.

Libra I's are usually intense personalities, capable of great achievements. Yet they can be torn by indecision, even spending years trying to make up their minds what course to follow. At times they may put so much time and exertion into a non-productive effort, perhaps a hobby or a relationship, that they leave themselves little time or energy for more positive endeavors. Highly challenged by problems, they may find it difficult to give up, fail or even admit that they have been wasting their time.

Libra I's are usually quite emotionally complex. They often give an impression of coolness that masks a maelstrom of inner emotions. They have a tendency not only to get bottled up inside but to resist the attempts of others to help them out. Mastery of their feelings is usually a high priority for them, the danger being that their conscious self-control may over time become unconscious repression, a difficult state to rectify. The challenge of penetrating to the emotional core of these fascinating and challenging individuals may keep their intimates busy for a lifetime.

The Libra I inability to share or discuss their feelings at a deep level, however, may ultimately prove debilitating to any relationship. Those personally involved with Libra I's would do best to keep feelings out in the open from the start, even to the point of insisting that those born in this week vent their emotions, whether positive and negative—not only happiness, joy and love but anger, jealousy, dislike and even hatred. Once both parties' feelings are made known, and the air has cleared, issues of vital concern to each person can be reasonably discussed rather than being avoided.

Swings between overinterest and disinterest may also have an adverse effect on the stability of Libra I relationships. Their lovers and mates may enjoy their sexual intensity but may ultimately need to withdraw a bit in order to establish a private space. On the other hand, those born in this week are just as capable of ignoring those they live with, particularly when absorbed in their own work, leaving their partners a tad frustrated.

Libra I's have a wry sense of humor and often a biting wit, which can express itself in many forms, but principally in irony and sarcasm. Their humor is not generally intended to hurt, however, or even to make others laugh, but to make them think. Libra I's can make scathing criticisms that may wound those close to them deeply, yet they probably don't fully realize the emotional effects of their statements. If they want to live harmoniously with those who care for them, they must become more tactful and gentle in expressing their dissatisfaction.

ADVICE:

Cultivate self-confidence. Beware of being too aggressive in your criticism of others—your bark can bite. Be consistent in your stance. Fight the impulse to procrastinate, but at the same resist interfering with things that work, even if they do not meet your expectations. Mistakes are just part of the game.

Canadian pianist Glenn Gould once occasioned conductor George Szell to quip, "The nut's a genius!" A Perfectionist to the nth degree, Gould caused many recording executives, engineers and conductors to pull out their hair over the years and ultimately was at his best working alone. Gould's antics included arriving for recording sessions bundled in a fur coat and gloves in the heat of summer, insisting on playing seated on a beat-up chair his father made for him, singing and conducting himself as he played and, perhaps most unnerving for other musicians, not paying a whole lot of attention to them. His achievements include some of the finest renditions of Bach and pre-Bach music. Gould's legendary technique forced pedagogues to reexamine many of their assumptions about piano playing.

Like many Libra I's, sex goddess Brigitte Bardot had the intense need to be in the limelight. Eventually, she quit her film career to devote herself to animal-rights interests, which had previously been more of a hobby. Her pout and revealing clothes became a trademark in the 50s, when her first film, And God Created Woman, caused a furor over its sexually explicit material. Her first interviews in America show her fully living up to her movie image. In turning her social involvement to more personal and meaningful work, she is typical of many born in her week.

BRIGITTE BARDOT

Leader of the zany Marx Brothers, Groucho Marx was the most outspoken, sharp and ironic of the three, as might be expected of a Libra I. His quick repartee and off-the-cuff quips became his trademark and continued after his film career, when he hosted the popular TV quiz show You Bet Your Life. Groucho's appeal was primarily verbal but he also duckwalked, lifted his eyebrows and wielded his cigar with telling effect. Brothers Chico and Harpo, writers S.J. Perelman and George Kaufmann and Paramount Pictures all deserve credit, but in the final analysis, it was Groucho who was most important in the success of their films. The Marx Brothers had a tremendous impact on succeeding generations of comics, and their popularity continues unabated.

LIBRA II

The Week of Society

October 3–10

The Libra II period takes Society as its central image. In human terms, this period can be compared to a time in one's middle life when a more meaningful relationship with society, or an increase in time given to social entities (political causes, clubs, religious organizations, study groups, neighborhood or community associations, etc.), often takes place. During this period, deepening one's social ties can be central to life, not only with the institutions mentioned but also with lifelong friends and family members.

The days that comprise Libra II symbolically reveal certain aspects of middle age: taking the lead in defining social mores, making difficult judgments, acquiring objective wisdom about human psychology and learning to husband one's physical and financial resources.

The paradox about those born in this week is that although their social skills are highly developed, they may really be loners by nature. Their knowledge of current events, fashions and matters concerning lifestyle is impressive, and family and friends usually consult them as to the choice of materials or methods to get the job done in the most tasteful way possible. Constantly in demand, Libra II's often have difficulty finding time for themselves, and at some point must learn how to limit the time and energy they are prepared to give.

Generally well liked as people, Libra II's are also highly sought after as confidants and counselors. They inspire trust in those who are meeting them for the first time. Their nonthreatening approach makes other people quickly feel that they have nothing to fear from Libra

II's, to whom they can open their hearts and unburden themselves. Indeed Libra II's rarely behave hurtfully or maliciously toward those who confide in them. Those who seek them out feel safe with them.

Although fair, just and agreeable in most situations, Libra II's can also be extremely sharp and critical. Because their insights are so often right on, their barbs can sting. Associates and employers who listen to them can probably learn something, but the fury of a Libra II attack often arouses too much negative emotion in the assaulted party to allow for clear listening. Only later will the truth of their criticisms begin to sink in.

Libra II children can be demanding of their parents, and Libra II parents can be strict with their children. When young, those born in this week may be extremely rebellious or at the very least troublesome to those in authority. Libra II's are guided by a sense of fairness but also by an extreme antipathy to stupid, harmful and needless regulations and laws. Too often young Libra II's may see the harm or waste being caused by a social or parental attitude yet feel helpless to do much about it. As they grow up, they may become crusaders or reformers, but they can just as easily turn into quiet observers who watch and listen but only offer their opinions and judgments when asked to do so.

Emotional instability may be the single biggest problem that Libra II's face. It can undermine their relationships, making them prone to jealousy, irritation, possessiveness and all sorts of negative emotions that they could really do without. Physical problems and even lifelong disabilities can result. Involvement in some form of spiritual, religious or physical training is often essential to Libra II's, to provide the stability and grounding that those born in this week require if they are to keep on an even keel.

There is too often a glaring discrepancy between what Libra II's think they want and what they truly need. Those born in this week may blunt their own desires by not taking them seriously. Thus, through their own insistence that they don't need something, they can stunt the development of their will. Any resulting confusion, unhappiness or despair may serve them well, if they can take advantage of it. Through depression, they can get in touch with themselves at a deep level and, stripped of externals, will find out what their deepest needs really are.

An ever-present danger for these imaginative individuals is that they will come to live too much in a fantasy world in which all things are possible. Through complacency, and narcissistic enjoyment, they can fail to take action. This lack of aggression may affect their professional life. Worldly ambition can be very healthy for Libra II's, since it can spur them on to be more assertive, and to demand from the world what they really want. The problems here are they aren't always sure what their true wishes are, and they are too often satisfied with what they have and indecisive in charting out a realistic course of action.

Libra II's are highly valued by their friends, not least for their light and fun-loving manner. They are often good conversationalists, and even the most shy Libra II blossoms in activities involving a small group of companions, such as parties, dinners or outings. Those born in this week are highly responsible in such surroundings, and may be depended upon to make a contribution. Yet as aware and realistic as they are about other people, to the same or a greater degree they can be unrealistic about themselves. It may be an unfortunate trait of Libra II's to pull the wool over their own eyes. Such self-deception can lead to disastrous choices of partner, and also to professional blunders. Simply put: without a clear view of themselves, Libra II's cannot make cogent personal choices, and are constantly landing themselves in trouble. Fortunately, they are highly resilient. Still, they must not take their ability to snap back from injury or defeat for granted, or rely on it unduly.

During rocky periods in their personal relationships, Libra II's tend to be more hurtful toward themselves than to the other person. This is a signless of masochistic tendencies than of low self-esteem, and of a habit of putting the needs and wants of a lover or friend before their own. Their difficulty in expressing anger and aggression leads them to blame themselves when things go wrong. They may consequently sink into a quiet depression, tumbling into a well of loneliness from which it may be extremely difficult for them to climb out.

*Try to find your true heart's desire. Once you have found it, remember to show you really care. Don't always give things away—hold on to what is most valuable in yourself. ## LIBRA II NOTABLES

The involvement of Rev. Jesse Jackson in the civil rights movement dates back 35 years to his days as a college undergraduate. As a Libra II, most of his adult life has been taken up with social issues, such as helping to advance the cause of African Americans. Having marched with Dr. Martin Luther King in Selma, Ala., he then joined the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. In the 70s and 80s Jackson became active internationally and also worked to promote voter registration. A prominent voice at Democratic national conventions, Jackson has enormously developed people skills and a keen insight into social problems and the ability to express them with power and eloquence. His talent for working with groups was evident in his Operation Breadbasket and the Rainbow Coalition.

Oscar-winning actress Susan Sarandon blew everyone away with her performance opposite Sean Penn in Dead Man Walking. Respected in the film world for her refusal to compromise herself in less demanding or more glitzy roles, Sarandon is an individualist who does what she wants but also what she feels is best. A devoted mother and companion, it seems her life off the screen is at least as important to her as that on it. Her good-natured sociability is characteristic of Libra II's, as are her vivacious feistiness and outspoken political views. Other virtuoso perfor-

The most socially aware of the Beatles, John Lennon had insights into the workings of society that enabled him to become the spokesman for a whole generation of young people. In typical Libra II fashion, Lennon could be extremely cutting and critical of social conventions that stood in the way of personal development. Increasingly political, Lennon was largely responsible for the Beatles' anarchical ideologies but also embodied a certain idealism, as in his solo hit Imagine. With wife Yoko Ono at his side, Lennon's stature as a cultural icon grew and he matured as a person. While in a period of depressive withdrawal, Lennon was murdered outside his New York City apartment in 1980.

LIBRA III

The Week of Theater

October 11–18

The Libra III period takes Theater as its central image. This period can be likened in human terms to a person's late forties, by which time full social integration of the individual has usually been accomplished or attempted. The adoption of a given social role is generally well set by now. What remains is to play that role consummately on life's stage. Particularly important at this time are the development of expressive qualities and the bringing of one's powers to bear on building a great success in, one hopes a pleasing and judicious way.

The days that comprise Libra III symbolically reveal the confident adult in middle life striving to balance the many social demands made on him/her, exercising shrewd judgment and sound leadership, and, through sensing the rhythms of life, staying attuned to the large line all the while furthering the action.

If "all the world's a stage," as Shakespeare wrote, then Libra III's are some of the finest players upon it. Acting out the drama of their own lives in everyday affairs is a specialty of those born in this week. Libra III's know the value of image in their professional lives and spend a lot of time working on how they present themselves to the world. Their detachment, even coolness, may sometimes irritate or infuriate those around them, but it is misleading; if they seem to lack affect, this is usually a result of a studied and rigorous training they put themselves through. Libra III's are actually very emotional people.

Hardheaded, Libra III's may stick to the same course for years, whether it is right for them or wrong. Their drive to move ahead at any cost makes them mistrust silence and repose; they prefer doing to thinking. Their mistakes can consequently be big ones, since they may give themselves wholeheartedly and sometimes prematurely to an endeavor without either analyzing and planning it or tuning in to their intuitions about it beforehand. Accidents of all types may well result from this unheeding attitude.

Leadership qualities are often highly developed in Libra III's, who typically find themselves at the head of a social group or business. Once again, however, in leading a family or assuming an executive role they may act with a certain hubris or sense of infallibility, neglecting to gauge the effects of their actions on co-workers, employees or relatives. On top of this, if they are finally forced to face failure they may be confronting something they had hitherto considered an impossibility, and the shock can prove too much for them. Libra III's who can cultivate true humility with respect to their fellow humans will be much happier in the long run.

Libra III's who have faced great disappointment may become cynical. Such world-weary individuals can be revived through love and affection, but these are the very qualities they usually find most difficult to share. Opening their hearts to a trusted friend or family member is essential to their psychological well-being. Perhaps psychological help is the obvious solution, but most born in this week are resistant to it. In times of trouble, the loved ones of Libra III's must often assume a heavy load indeed, knowing that they and they alone are keeping their partners going.

Worldliness is perhaps the greatest strength of Libra III's; their knowhow, knowledge and experience give them the confidence they need to enjoy the challenges of their chosen field. Almost invariably specialists or experts of some kind, Libra III's are quite capable of dominating their professional field. They have a need to be well informed, and if they are ignorant in some area, they characteristically make this a challenge to learn. Although hardheaded, Libra III's will give consideration to any idea, no matter how far out, not out of a sense of fairness but because of the chance that it will contribute something to their knowledge. To them, knowledge is power.

Difficulties arise in the personal relationships of those born in this week when their lovers or mates feel neglected. In truth, Libra III's are not terribly interested in other people, or in their feelings, and although they suffer exceedingly when misunderstood, they seldom go out of their way to understand others. Those born in the Week of Theater are uncomfortable when heavy emotional expectations are put on them, and either withdraw or flee. They see themselves as serious, responsible and ethical, but they may relate more immediately to other people's ideas or values, and what these represent, than to who these people actually are.

The friend or mate of a Libra III may have to play a subordinate role, since those born in the Week of Theater usually take center stage. Yet they also have a needy side, and they often do best in relationships with strong, even dominant personalities whom they can lean on. When someone becomes partially or completely dependent on them, on the other hand, Libra III's can become uncomfortable and restless, longing to escape. They must feel able to assume and discharge responsibilities generously and of their own accord, rather than being forced to do so.

The masculine and the feminine come together strongly in Libra III's.

They can be extremely intense in the bedroom, an area that permits their full range of emotional expression. Once released, however, these passions may well spill over in anger and upset, which they vent on their partner in the form of arguments replete with recrimination and blame. Libra III anger is violent but for the most part mercifully short-lived, for those born in this week are not inclined to bring strife into their daily lives.

Probably the best thing that can happen emotionally to a Libra III is to be or become an active member of a family group that can provide the affection, support and appreciation these hard-driving individualists need. The problem is, many Libra III's are not particularly interested in families—whether spouses, children or their own parents. As a substitute, they may seek to live, work or play with a group of long-standing friends whom they trust and respect. Even so, the workaholic tendencies of Libra III's will often prevent them from spending a great deal of time with whatever group or individual they choose to live with, and may in fact reflect their true preference—to live alone.

A consummate showman, Pavarotti is master of the grand gesture and the theatrical. Like others born in the Week of Theater, Pavarotti seems more comfortable on the stage than off. Most at home singing in Italian, Pavarotti has capitalized on the popularity of opera in our time but also has done much to create a whole new audience for the art due to his infectious Libra III enjoyment of what he does.

Daughter of a greengrocer, "The Iron Lady" Margaret Thatcher ruled Great Britain as prime minister and head of the Conservative party from 1979 to 1990. Thatcher molded the country along the lines of her own thinking in the 80s, instituting a political philosophy known as "Thatcherism," which more or less tried to get rid of government supports and worked to put everyone on their own, for better or worse. Her strongly moral convictions led her to condemn South Africa, Argentina and Iraq. Thatcher brought a strong sense of Theater to the political arena. Also typical of Libra III's, Thatcher had highly developed leadership qualities but also an air of infallibility and a refusal to admit failure, which finally led to her being dumped by her party.

MARGARET THATCHER

With all his artistic inconsistencies and failures, Eugene O'Neill still remains the giant of American theater. The tragedies of his personal life are mirrored in the fact that out of 60 plays he wrote only one comedy. His father was an alcoholic, his mother a morphine addict, his oldest son committed suicide, and he refused to ever speak to his daughter Oona after she married Charlie Chaplin. But Theater was in his blood, and he moved the Provincetown Players to New York to present his own works. The strange workings of fate powered the tragedy of O'Neill's plays, which were largely about relationships gone wrong. In some ways O'Neill came to represent the kind of Libra III who has become cynical through great disappointment, but his best dramas rose above such attitudes to become universal in scope.

LIBRA-SCORPIO CUSP

The Cusp of Drama and Criticism

October 19–25

The Libra-Scorpio cusp is an admixture of the seventh sign of the zodiac, Libra, and the eighth sign of the zodiac, Scorpio, where the airy, social, theatrical Libra nature confronts the more serious, deeply feeling and critical nature of Scorpio. This cusp can be likened to the period around forty-nine years of age in the human life and comes in the middle of fall in the northern hemisphere. In human development, at the age of forty-nine, the midlife period is ending and middle age approaching. This is a period that can be characterized by the themes of Drama and Criticism. A heightened sense of the drama of life, both in a philosophical and personal sense, leads to an increased awareness of the dynamics of one's own existence, past and present; a highly critical attitude emerges that cuts away careless generalizations and sloppy thinking, and aims for the essence of truth. Such an attitude can lead to profound changes in personal relationships, how leisure time is spent and in general to a reevaluation of one's place in the world.

Big personalities, those born on the Libra-Scorpio cusp may prove too much for anyone to handle. Their influence can not only dominate their immediate circle but go far beyond it; that influence is surely personal, for these are charismatic individuals, but also often intellectual, since their ideas are well thought out and highly developed. Libra-Scorpios usually have something to say on almost any subject. Their penchant for preaching from the pulpit makes them well suited to be teachers, whether professionally or informally, and their students usually come to depend heavily on them for guidance.

Those born on this cusp meld the airy (mental) nature of Libra and the watery (emotional) characteristics of Scorpio—not always an easy task. These two aspects of their personality are often at war, with the head guiding and the heart denying, or viceversa. Libra-Scorpios can get into a real mess with themselves when their intellectual and emotional natures clash. Periods of Libra indecision may be broken by outbursts of Scorpio aggression, and self-assured Scorpio determination and control may be undermined by Libra procrastination and love of repose. The tensions and disappointments of life can at times prove too much for them, such that they retreat into isolation. Thus Libra-Scorpios benefit from physical exercise, fitness training, sound diets and all activities that promote healthy contact with the world, and relationships and activities that lessen their tendency to isolate themselves from the world or will prove beneficial to them.

The mental orientation of those born on the Cusp of Drama and Criticism appears in their perceptiveness and sharp insightfulness. The twin dangers here are a sense of personal infallibility and a tendency to be overcritical; the disapproving or denigrating attitudes of Libra-Scorpios can hurt those close to them, undermining their confidence in subtle ways. The intimates of Libra-Scorpios may have to fight back against such negative expectations and predictions, not just to protect but to liberate themselves. Those born on this cusp should seriously think about the project of learning to back off, and of not only keeping their opinions to themselves but in many cases letting go of them completely.

Those born on this cusp have a decidedly modern approach in most areas, but also shelter an undeniable sense of tradition. This is particularly clear in their devotion to parents and children, in whose lives they play a large role—sometimes too large. Not that Libra-Scorpios too easily accept their parents’ values—far from it. Their attachment is more emotional. After a stormy and rebellious adolescence, those born on this cusp often return to an extremely close relationship with their parents in later life.

As responsible as many Libra-Scorpios seem in many areas of everyday life, they have an undeniably wild, unpredictable side. Dramatic and impulsive, they will unhesitatingly fly in the face of society’s moral codes to assert their values or express themselves, which they can do both cogently and flamboyantly. Even the mildest of those born on this cusp have an exhibitionistic side, and want and need others to take notice of them. The private lives of Libra-Scorpios may include many love affairs, charting a path strewn with the broken hearts of those who have had relationships with them. Their particular brand of charisma, impulsiveness and mental power makes them formidable and sometimes even dangerous individuals to be involved with.

Sensuousness and passion are important themes in the lives of those born on the Cusp of Drama and Criticism. In their relationships with others, however, they may exhibit a split between these two areas, treating sexuality quite differently from sensuality, and basing a relationship squarely on either one or the other, and only rarely on both. Libra-Scorpios express their sensuousness in their love of the beautiful and tasteful objects with which they surround themselves, or in an appreciation of art, music and literature.

Those romantically involved with Libra-Scorpios must beware of addictive tendencies in such relationships. Unduly deep attachments that go beyond usual or even healthy limits may result in debilitating dependencies and painful partings and breakups, even in symptoms resembling drug withdrawal. The most successful type of Libra-Scorpio personality is able to structure relationships so that both parties have their own space and retain their identities; less successful individuals born on this cusp may be fated to experience a painful string of failed relationships. A combination of deep love and friendship in a marriage with a Libra-Scorpio is possible, however, and such a bond will overcome almost any difficulties that may arise.

With children, whether their own or those of other family members or friends, Libra-Scorpios take seriously the role of responsible adult guide, but can lose their objectivity and wind up getting too emotionally involved. Those born on this cusp must learn to be respectful of children, students and other young people, and to realize how damaging their feelings and desires, and perhaps their unrealistic expectations, may prove.

*Try to relax and have fun. Learn to be less picky. Do not cut yourself off from unusual experiences but maintain your poise and balance. ## LIBRA - SCORPIO CUSP NOTABLES

What was it about Sarah Bernhardt that made her a stage legend? Of slight build, with frizzy red hair and a pale face, she looked soulful but not overly impressive. That is, until she started to speak and move. Drama flowed from Bernhardt, from every pore, mesmerizing her audiences and sending them into other worlds. "The Divine Sarah" on stage was charismatic and hypnotic. However, like other Libra-Scorpios, she could be wild, unpredictable and fly in the face of authority. Not easy to get along with, Bernhardt was kinder to her audiences than to those with and for whom she worked. Finally, tired of being bound to other companies' whims, she established her own theater in Paris. Bernhardt could play a variety of parts and even performed the lead role in Shakespeare's Hamlet.

Heavyweight champion of the world Evander Holyfield was able to defeat Buster Douglas, Riddick Bowe and Mike Tyson to gain the title on three separate occasions. A serious underdog to Tyson, it was clear at fight's end that almost everyone had underestimated Holyfield's capabilities and determination. Drama has surrounded Holyfield during much of his life, but he is a humble man who is religious and unassuming. Although diagnosed with a heart problem that disqualified him for boxing, the condition miraculously cleared up, which allowed him to continue his career. Like many Libra-Scorpios, Holyfield's determination to improve his physical condition brought him into closer touch with the world.

Considered by many to be the greatest artist of the 20th century, Pablo Picasso could pay for any meal by simply signing the napkin. Although sensuousness and passion characterized his affairs and marriages, so did emotional problems, typical of many Libra-Scorpio relationships. Immensely critical of himself and others, Picasso mastered many styles of 20th-century painting. This can be readily observed by viewing a retrospective of his extremely varied work, which in some ways resembles a history of modern art. The Spanish master was also an accomplished sculptor, ceramicist and lithographer. Extremely prolific, Picasso worked almost continuously for 80 years and produced many thousands of artworks. Political views were uncompromising—his antifascist stance is embodied in his great masterpiece Guernica.

SCORPIO I

The Week of Intensity

October 26–November 2

The Scorpio I period takes Intensity as its central image. According to The Grand Cycle of Life, this period can be likened to the onset of middle age, when the power of an individual begins to fully emerge, to peak at some future point in the fifties or early sixties. In the Scorpio I period the ability to take control, to effectively husband and exert one's powers over the environment, to subdue wayward elements to one's will are manifested.

The days that comprise Scorpio I illustrate the underlying theme of Intensity, and the accompanying capacity to formulate, guide and finally transform unpolished materials creatively and efficiently into highly valuable and viable entities. Though biological drives may be lessened or eliminated by this time of life, sexual or romantic expression is not necessarily diminished in importance; many even report feelings of a greater intensity that are more measured and directed, and less diffuse or unstable.

Scorpio I's are demanding personalities, who have few equals in attention to detail and applying their powers of concentration to the task at hand. Those born in the Week of Intensity are extremely discriminating, possibly to the point of being judgmental. Particularly in matters of fairness and ethics, they are likely to evaluate people more for their motives than for their actions and sternly pass sentence on those they see as transgressing the bounds of morality. They can be equally strict themselves, however, and are highly prone to guilt over wayward thoughts and deeds. Thus their conscience is always powerfully at work. Getting the job done is important to them, but the way in which it is done has top priority. Even the mildest of those born in this week have more than a touch of the performer to them. Their virtuoso energies are often the outward manifestation of a needy side—a craving for approval and affection from their families and friends.

More than most people, Scorpio I's have a charged, polarized personality with two sides—one sunny, one dark. Their sunny side gives them a radiance and a seductive charm that can melt the hardest hearts; their dark side is destructive, and when out of control can inflict serious damage, not only on those around them but on themselves. It is this intensity that makes them unlikely to back down from confrontation, so that they often hang in until the bitter end. When they are troubled, their lack of confidence comes to the fore, and may manifest, for example, in a conviction that they cannot get anything right, or that those they care for dislike them. Accusing others of having negative emotions (such as anger, jealousy, or feelings of rejection) that they in fact are feeling and projecting themselves is too often the mechanism they use to ease their pain.

Those born in this week pride themselves on being aware of what they do, and on accepting responsibility for their actions. As a consequence, when another person commits an act against them they most often assume that it was done knowingly or willfully. This refusal to believe that the other person acted innocently or without premeditation can precipitate conflict. Further, Scorpio I's usually refuse to accept excuses for, say, lateness, or for missing an appointment altogether through forgetfulness. They too often view the claim of a memory lapse as a disguise for an intended hurt. Nor do Scorpio I's equally accept all the apologies other people make for their actions: they are more willing to forgive a false move than an impure motive.

It may be difficult for Scorpio I's to forgive, but it is almost impossible for them to forget slights, condescension and anything they see as an insult to their intelligence. They are thin-skinned when it comes to criticism, so those close to them will have to tread lightly to avoid arguments. Such conflicts can ultimately have a destructive influence on a relationship, and may lead to a breakup; but they can also have the positive effect of clearing the air, promoting honesty and in general bringing partners to work on improving relations. Excepting in certain moral areas, which remain closed, Scorpio I's most often prefer discussion to combat, but must beware of argument for argument's sake. If attacked directly, however, either verbally or physically, they will fight it out.

Still, the main thrust of Scorpio I judgments is not destructive per se—quite to the contrary. Those born in this week tend to feel that they wouldn't even be bothering with someone unless they cared enough about them to help improve their lot. Scorpio I's believe in the positive value of criticism and doubt that a bad situation will get better by itself. Yet their lovers and friends may grow tired of their often painfully sharp analyses, no matter how perceptive these judgments may eventually prove to be. A "blame, blame, guilt and shame" mantra may, unfortunately, be the only message that either party remembers hearing.

Because Scorpio I's value quality far above quantity, they are suspicious of those who are overly versatile, or who make elaborate claims for the merit of all of the different parts of their work equally. Those born in this week think it better to do one thing really well than to do many things acceptably well. Their friends may be few, their contacts with their parents may be carefully planned and controlled, their relations with co-workers or business partners may be highly selective. Those picked as the friend or mate of such discerning, often knowledgeable individuals often feel honored. To have the undivided attention of a Scorpio I who is attractive, interesting and single-minded can be very gratifying, particularly to egos in need of bolstering.

Lovers will attest to the highs of intimate relations with those born in this week, and friends know the warmth and good feelings that they engender. Of particular note is their sense of humor—they can keep those around them rolling around on the floor. Scorpio I's are often excellent mimics, imitating accents, gestures and movements equally well. They are also terrible teasers, one moment mock serious, then exploding in derisive laughter. Once they have found your weak spot or funny bone, they will not give up in their tickling, even when your amusement begins to become uncomfortably like its opposite.

SCORPIO I NOTABLES

An extraordinarily gifted poet, Dylan Thomas led a tempestuous and tragic emotional life. Dead at 39 from acute alcohol poisoning, the Intensity he lavished on his poetic art had turned inward and destroyed him. Welshman Thomas published his first book of poems when he was only 20 and was immediately recognized as a literary genius. His plays Under Milk Wood and A Child's Christmas in Wales have been heard and loved by audiences around the world on BBC radio, for whom Thomas was also a commentator. The number of Thomas's poems is small, emphasizing his Scorpio I attentiveness to detail and insistence on quality rather than quantity. Although many find his poetry difficult to understand, few can deny the beauty of his highly original language, rich sense of metaphor and rhetoric.

U.S. First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton has always been a hardworking and dynamic individual. Her Intensity is unmistakable, as she turns her laser light on whatever issue is at hand. She has brought her attentiveness to many areas, as a brilliant student, lawyer, professor, chairperson, social program director and family member. Typical of Scorpio I's, Hillary Clinton is a highly charged and demanding personality who has assumed an extremely active role as First Lady. Her intelligence and courage under fire are particularly evident. Like a true Scorpio, she is often at her best when under attack.

HILLARY RODHAM
CLINTON

At 38 the youngest billionaire in history, Bill Gates is among the richest men in America, a result of his gigantic Microsoft empire. Since most of the computers in the world run on Microsoft's software, it is not hard to realize why the company is worth over $25 billion and surpasses most car and aircraft companies in financial clout. Gates himself has been pictured as a nerd, often appearing sheepishly dressed in rumpled clothes. His startling vision, expressed in his book, The Road Ahead, combined with his achievements thus far, illustrate that the future belongs to those who create it. Characteristic of Scorpio I's, Gates does his homework and learns from his mistakes. Single-minded and discerning, he has little doubt where he is headed.

SCORPIO II

The Week of Depth

November 3–11

The Scorpio II period takes Depth as its central image. This period can be likened symbolically to the time in a middle-aged individual's life when deeper areas of the personality make their demands and a new, profound source of power may be uncovered. In the Scorpio II period, contact is made with unconscious and chthonic forces capable of effecting transformative changes in a person.

The days that comprise Scorpio II symbolically reveal the more serious side of human life, and the ability to go beyond ordinary experience through a revelation, metamorphosis and probing of the internal and external world. As when oil is struck and a geyser explodes, tremendous energies can be released from the deep layers of the unconscious. Such energies must, of course, be well directed, or destruction could easily result. Ideally, powerful new insights may result at this time.

Profundity in all forms is an irresistible attraction to Scorpio II's. Shunning superficiality, those born in the Week of Depth take a measured and serious view of life, both at work and at home. This is not to say that they don't like to have fun—far to the contrary. In pursuing their hobbies, pastimes and lighter activities, however, they show the same full-bodied intensity and concentration that they do in the more purposeful parts of their lives.

Those born in the Week of Depth are highly competitive in their careers and leisure activities, but they seldom allow this impulse into their private lives. Jealousy and envy are naturally close to their passionate core, but Scorpio II's are generally able to understand and control such emotions to prevent them from running riot. In extreme cases, however, these feelings may emerge powerfully in the Scorpio II personality, threatening to engulf it entirely.

One area in which the position of Scorpio II's is firmly fixed is that of finance. They are well aware of the power of money in daily life, and rarely will they knowingly put themselves at an economic disadvantage. They may even worry unduly about financial matters, and although they are not miserly, they do tend to hold on to what they have. They can get very upset with mates and business partners who are too free with their spending or downright fiscally irresponsible. Yet they must beware of applying a double standard, for they, too, can go overboard, spending money on themselves shamelessly. To allay their own feelings of anxiety, Scorpio II's need to be good earners.

Scorpio II's can be empathic with the suffering of others, for they know what it is to suffer themselves. Those born in the Week of Depth don't generally seek out painful situations, but they know that a life without hardship and struggle has little meaning. They will feel, say, the death of a parent, friend, child or mate deeply—so deeply, in fact, that it can have an overwhelming or catastrophic effect on them; indeed, they may never recover from it. Scorpio II's may not ruminate on the subject of death, and usually try to put it out of their minds, but at a deeper level they are often obsessed with the subject. The need to sleep soundly for long periods yet the failure to remember their dreams can be characteristic of such personalities, who need a lot of time for unconscious expression and often cut off the content of such activities from daily awareness.

It can be difficult to get Scorpio II's to open up emotionally and to talk about whatever may be bothering them. Even a trusted life partner or dear friend must pass all kinds of roadblocks before getting close to the inner feelings of those born in this week. To listen to what Scorpio II's are finally ready to say requires patience, understanding and nonclaiming love. Any deep bond formed with such an individual obviously cannot be taken lightly; not everyone is ready for such deep and heavy commitment.

Scorpio II's are fascinated by forms of escape. Physical or psychic retreat to a safe haven, and the ability to switch off their mental motor at will, allows those born in this week to deal with aspects of daily life that they would rather not face. Television, movies, music and books are healthy habits for them, but addiction, to drugs, alcohol, sex or violence, is always a real possibility, too. When such activity involves others, Scorpio II's are not necessarily the initiators; they often repress their shadow side. Instead, however, they may summon up possessive or violent behavior in their immediate environment, forcing their mates and lovers to act out their own repressed negativity. This may be directed against the Scorpio II, who then becomes his or her own victim.

Scorpio II's are not the best choice for victimization, for they are counter-punchers by nature and can be fierce in protecting themselves and their loved ones. Few who have experienced their anger will seek to arouse it a second time. It is typical of Scorpio II's, in fact, to be occasionally subject to volcanic outbursts of emotion,

Scorpio II's generally make steadfast friends and faithful lovers and mates. This is only partly a matter of morality; being overly flexible and changeable is really not possible for those born in this week, so turning from one partner to another, or adopting new methods and techniques in their work, is generally not an option for them. Being forced to make such switches by circumstances or fate can bring out their worst side.

Both lovers and friends can testify to the softer side of Scorpio II's. Although their presence is often formidable, they can be unusually kind, giving, and even quite sentimental. Those born in this week are generally kind to animals and small children, who awaken their protective and nurturing instincts. Scorpio II's can make excellent parents.

Those born in this week can be secretive and controlling—typical Scorpio traits. Their sexual needs and demands often also run high, but they can equally well go for long periods of time without wanting intimate contact. Scorpio II's are, generally speaking, very physical, enjoying the pleasures of table and bed. As long as they remain sensitive to their partners and capable of moderation, such drives and appetites can have a positive effect on their relationships. Indeed, Scorpio II's are often only able to overcome their strong attraction to fixed habitual behaviors by learning to share true affection and love.

The only person to win Nobel Prizes in both physics and chemistry, Polish-born scientist Marie Curie was a genius of rare magnitude. Co-discoverer with her husband, Pierre, of two new elements, radium and polonium, Madame Curie studied the properties of X-rays and their ability to kill harmful cells. Discovering many hidden atomic secrets, Curie's probing into deep, plutonic realms of matter symbolize her Scorpio II orientation. Able to couple investigative instincts and the Scorpio II need to control, Curie was ideally suited to conduct her experiments. Her husband was killed in a tragic car accident, while she herself finally succumbed to the cumulative effects of the radiation she worked with most of her life in the form of leukemia.

Symbolizing the passionate sexual orientation of Scorpio II, Austrian actress Hedy Lamarr blew a few circuits with her first Hollywood film appearances. Having already aroused a storm of protest over her nude appearance in the Czech film Ecstasy, neither American film moguls nor Lamarr herself were oblivious to her stimulating effect on audiences.

The dark-haired Scorpionic beauty may not have been a great actress, but opposite Victor Mature in the film Samson and Delilah, she manifested a kind of earthly temptation that both Samson and the audience found irresistible. Her films include Tortilla Flat, Her Highness and the Bellboy, White Cargo and Lady Without a Passport.

Dostoevski explore psychological torment and spiritual exaltation in a way never attempted before in the annals of literature. Redemption through suffering is a constant theme of Dostoevski, who was starkly existential in his insistence that life be lived to the fullest and on its own terms. His "Legend of the Grand Inquisitor" from The Brothers Karamazov shows Christ coming a second time, only to be sentenced to death by the very church established in his name.

Dostoevski's philosophical discussion of bread versus freedom anticipates the dilemma of communism.

SCORPIO III
The Week of Charm

November 12–18

The Scorpio III period takes Charm as its central image. This period can be compared in human terms to the time in a middle-aged person's life when the ability to influence others through magnetic and charismatic powers is heightened. In the Scorpio III period intense emotion may be used with telling effect to gain positive and constructive results, but equally well may be expended in furthering egotistical and narcissistic ends.

The days that comprise Scorpio III symbolically reveal the attractive powers of the middle-aged adult, and the ability to forward aims (but also gain satisfaction) through investigation, observation, seductive charm and a judicious use of leadership skills. Expressive emotions may be directed constructively as a powerful tool for inspiring others but should not be exercised as a controlling mechanism. Instead, by gaining the trust of co-workers, employees or clients, an emotional bond can be formed that promotes success for all concerned.

Realists first and foremost, Scorpio III's rarely overreach themselves. Because they have a realistic view not only of their own capabilities but of others' as well, their judgment is generally trustworthy and their assessments keen. Those born in this week do well in administrative positions or as leaders of a social group or working team, roles in which their evaluative, organizational and practical abilities can come to the fore.

Because Scorpio III's have a great deal together internally, many of them risk becoming complacent, or perhaps self-satisfied. This may be particularly clear in their careers, where they may reach an attainable point, then make no effort to rise higher. Unless those near and dear to Scorpio III's encourage them to take chances from time to time, they may stagnate and, eventually, come to regret lost opportunities. The Scorpio III's who prove the most successful in life, whether in their careers or in their personal and spiritual endeavors, are often those who have dared to strive toward realizing their most impossible dreams.

The passions of Scorpio III's are as strong as their control. Thus those born in this week may be subject to raging internal wars, which can even threaten to destroy them. The charming or inscrutable facade that Scorpio III's present to the world often hides tremendous inner conflicts. Those who are the objects of such passions, and the causes of such conflicts, may never realize how much emotion they are arousing, and therefore can hardly be expected to assume responsibility for it. Scorpio III's who are able to show or at least discuss a small part of their feeling for another person will be closer to realizing success in their personal relationships.

Those born in this week are not accustomed to putting themselves in a disadvantageous position, no matter how much they desire a job or person. Their dignity is important to them, and they will rarely compromise it. Should they reach one of those points in life where an attraction is so overwhelming that it does obstruct their good sense, Scorpio III's will only succumb after a tremendous inner struggle. Addictions of all sorts, whether to drugs, medicines, people or behavior patterns, they only break with difficulty, but such compulsions, once mastered, are rarely readopted.

Scorpio III's must be careful lest they dominate others through overprotective or controlling attitudes. Such influences may be quite subtle, since those born in this week rarely seem smothering or dictatorial on the surface: fair and understanding, they arouse loyalty not only at home but at work. People tend to follow their bidding willingly, since they would never ask anyone to do something they wouldn't do themselves. Yet those born in the Week of Charm often throw up an unapproachable or forbidding exterior. Those who relate best to them are usually not put off by such a stance, or just don't see it at all. These are the people who can penetrate Scorpio III defenses and win their hearts.

Those who want to make friends with Scorpio III's must keep in mind their aversion to anyone looking for a free ride. Those born in this week are often attracted to self-sufficient individuals with something unusual to offer. On the other hand, the more seductive Scorpio III's are sometimes quite vulnerable to the seductive skills of others. In particular, the Scorpio III's who choose to follow a more questionable or unscrupulous path are in danger of getting conned by those with superior powers of deception.

Striving to remain open, even vulnerable, is the best hope for Scorpio III's if they are to avoid loneliness, particularly as they grow older. In seeming to have so much together, they often fail to arouse sympathy in others, yet their deeper needs are as great as anyone else's. The ability to admit to their weaknesses and faults, and the courage to own up to their failures or to grieve openly over their losses, will be important for them in forming deep and lasting love relationships. A life partner may only materialize for these capable individuals once they have truly begun to master—and ultimately, perhaps, to relinquish—their own controlling attitudes.

Scorpio III's rarely kid themselves about their romantic lives. No matter how much in love they seem to be, they are rarely found hanging on to relationships that have proved unproductive or detrimental; usually resourceful, self-possessed individuals, they know that there are always more fish in the sea. Yet they are faithful and sincere, and will give a relationship its best chance—but not more. Their sexual partners and mates learn soon enough not to take the attentions of Scorpio III's for granted, and to heed all warning signs—or find that what has been freely given can also be withheld, or withdrawn entirely.

Close friendships are important to Scorpio III's who have chosen to live alone, or who lack the support of a family group. Those born in the Week of Charm can build a complete world around good friends, who, at certain points, may take the place of siblings, parents, children, mates or lovers for them. They often spend time with people who are very different from themselves, making for friendships in which each member supplies what the other lacks. By forging a circle of friends, Scorpio III's may succeed in making up for all, or almost all, of their deficiencies.

Scorpio III's, Grace's modeling and stage acting attracted

Hollywood's attention, and she became a movie star, first in High Noon opposite Gary Cooper and later in three Alfred Hitchcock films: Dial M for Murder, Rear Window and To Catch a Thief. She caught Prince Rainier's eye at the Cannes Film Festival, and the rest is history. Her fairy-tale story came to an abrupt end when her car hurtled off a cliff. Irrepressible actress and comedienne Whoopi Goldberg has gone from standup comic to Oscar winner and presenter but has not lost one ounce of her strong personality. A Scorpio III realist, her off-the-cuff remarks cause many to cringe, but to Whoopi the truth is the truth, even if it hurts. Few would make the mistake of taking her on in a frontal assault, and the image of her approaching actor Danny Glover with razor in hand in the film The Color Purple is still chilling in retrospect. Whether playing a reluctant clairvoyant (Ghost) or basketball coach (Eddie), the steel behind Whoopi's smile is quite evident. Thanks to her determination, she has succeeded in establishing herself as a Hollywood and Broadway fixture.

WHOOPI GOLDBERG

For a man who has been in the news so much for the past 30 years or so, not that much is known about the real person behind the image of His Majesty Prince Charles, Prince of Wales and heir to the British throne. A secretive Scorpio III, Charles has thrown out lots of false clues as to his identity—in his roles as sportsman, husband, dutiful child, lover, architectural theorist, etc.—but none of these really rings true. Perhaps the role in which he will best express himself is not currently available. Because those born in this week do so well in administrative positions and thrive on responsibility, it may be that until Charles becomes king, we may not find out what he is really like.

SCORPIO-SAGITTARIUS CUSP

The Cusp of Revolution

November 19–24

The Scorpio-Sagittarius cusp is an admixture of the eighth sign of the zodiac, Scorpio, and the ninth sign of the zodiac, Sagittarius. The combined energies of the emotionally deep, serious and secretive Scorpio and the intuitive, outwardly directed, freedom-loving Sagittarius reflect the need first to understand oneself and then to act to institute change. The Scorpio-Sagittarius cusp may be said to represent Revolution. It is symbolic of the beginning of a new period of human life, around fifty-six years of age, when inescapable changes must take place: retirement may be coming up, marriages and other relationships may be forsaken, and physical limitations may have to be confronted. In addition, a greater empathy with one's fellow human beings and, with it, an interest in international or even universal concerns (religion or spirituality) may manifest now. Many people at this stage can feel resentment and rebelliousness at not having done what they really wanted to do in life and see this period as a "last chance" for them. The Revolutionary nature of this cusp can underline the need for total reorganization if crucial changes have not yet been made.

Not all revolutionaries are wide-eyed, bomb-throwing idealists; within the souls of many fighters for human rights lurk secret autocrats, who, once in power, may themselves be toppled by a further revolution. The revolt that engages those born on the Scorpio-Sagittarius cusp is often the fight against sloppiness, bad taste, ineffectualness, stupidity and old-fashioned, outworn attitudes. They are capable of exploding old myths, true, but they are equally capable of reviving and preserving myths that they view to be useful. Thus those born on this cusp can also be secret traditionalists at heart.

Characterized by a disdain for middle-of-the-road policies and middle-class ethics, most Scorpio-Sagittarians would rather be very rich or very poor, an aristocrat or a working-class hero or heroine, than anything in between. This hankering after extremes leads many born on this cusp to indulge in excess, sometimes in more than one area of their lives.

Scorpio-Sagittarians are usually aware from an early age that they are different from other people. An unusual blend of opposites, those born on the Cusp of Revolution combine the watery sensitivity of Scorpio with the fiery, freedom-loving nature of Sagittarius. In their family, then, they may occupy a lonely position in relation to parents or siblings, and their assessment of their peculiar abilities and strong drive to succeed often dates from their childhood years. Making plans for the future, dreaming up elegant new schemes and guiding a decent percentage of them to fruition are all characteristic of Scorpio-Sagittarian imagination and determination. Goal- and result-oriented, those born on this cusp often show the same stubbornness in picking out a friend or life partner, whom they may pursue with unrelenting zeal.

Scorpio-Sagittarian laughter is a direct barometer of their mental health. If you don't hear it in the first few minutes of conversation with them, you can generally be pretty sure that something is wrong. Those born on the Cusp of Revolution can use cutting sarcasm and derision not only to make a laughingstock of their enemies but to give even their dearest friends a good poke in the ribs every now and then. In this respect they operate with a bit of a double standard, for they do not take kindly to being talked down to or derided themselves, seeing such teasing as an attempt to humiliate them. They will not submit to this more than once from anybody.

Moral questions are important to those born on the Cusp of Revolution. They strive to be honest, but don't always manage it; they believe in being truthful, but often cannot measure up to their own standards. Finding it hard to be completely open and honest with those close to them, they may tell only a part of the truth, only to be embarrassed and regretful if they are found out later. Yet their undeniable charm, and their well-meaning, faithful and loyal attitudes, usually lead those who love them to forgive them.

Even the most serious critics of those born on the Cusp of Revolution admit that they have guts. Making it a specialty to say the unspeakable to the unapproachable, they not only seem to lack fear in dealing with authority figures without compromising, but demonstrate the power of such a stance. Yet they are, in fact, excellent at compromise, and know when to give ground and when to stand and fight. Their instinctive side is highly developed and will come to their aid when they believe enough in their own powers to trust it fully. Intuitive types, Scorpio-Sagittarians get muddled or confused when they try to depend too much on their rational abilities.

Those born on the Cusp of Revolution rarely forget either a slight or an act of true friendship. They are fully aware of the power of money but would rather not pursue an opportunity, even a lucrative one, if it means working with someone they do not respect. On the other hand, Scorpio-Sagittarians depend highly on their friends, of both sexes, and may be remarkably successful in doing business with those to whom they feel emotionally close, usually as partners or members of a team. They really see such associates as family.

Scorpio-Sagittarians are not the most stable of individuals in their romantic relationships. When they are young, their wildness and sense of adventure can lead them from one partner to another; meanwhile, of course, any commitment to a single deep relationship. Some Scorpio-Sagittarians may find a permanent mate necessary later in life, but this new setup may cause them to chafe at the bit, longing for the freedom they once knew. Others marry earlier but seek out a "modern" marriage, in which both spouses carry on their own lives more or less independently of each other. Spending a lot of time away from their partners guarantees Scorpio-Sagittarians the freedom they need with a minimum of jealousy and recrimination.

Lovers and mates of Scorpio-Sagittarians will testify to their highly sexual nature, which is not only passionate but also, to an extent, competitive and combative; those born on the Cusp of Revolution are confrontational in both work and play, and they do not leave this quality behind at the bedroom door. Scorpio-Sagittarians do have a sweet, affectionate side as well, but in their sexual contacts the carnal and ecstatic usually overshadow the soft and sensitive.

Robert Kennedy was only 35 years old when he took over the Justice Department as attorney general in 1961, appointed by his brother the president. Bobby quickly established himself as a force to be reckoned with. Somewhere between a working-class hero and an aristocrat in his sympathies and demeanor, Kennedy was typical of many born on the Cusp of Revolution. In his political position, Bobby had a chance to make even more enemies than his brother John, both in the government and organized crime, but, like many Scorpio-Sagittarians, he thrived on conflict and challenge. Competitive, combative and uncompromising, Kennedy fought his way into the Democratic party leadership and the hearts of Americans as a feisty, intractable opponent of all that was unfair. Like his brother, he succumbed to an assassin's bullet.

Perhaps the most passionate and violent of Mexico's muralists, Jose Orozco expressed his feelings fearlessly. Like many born on the Cusp of Revolution, Orozco was not afraid to make his opinions known, and his mastery of the mural enabled him to make statements in a big way. Originally trained as an architect, Orozco changed direction and gave his life to painting, drawing, murals and printmaking. Scorpio-Sagittarians are feeling-intuitive types, and Orozco was no exception, giving very direct expression to his emotional state. He played an extremely important role in the development of modern art in Mexico and through his dramatic murals was able to encourage its principles to be accepted by the general public.

Winner of the Nobel Prize for literature in 1991, South African novelist Nadine Gordimer was witness and scribe of the events in her country under apartheid. She grew up in a South African mining town, the daughter of European Jewish immigrants. An important theme in her writing was the position of the European in Africa and how people like her own family were able to adjust to a totally new way of life. Born on the Cusp of Revolution, Gordimer sought to express her opposition to apartheid quietly, as an objective observer rather than an activist. Nonetheless, three of her novels were banned by the oppressive South African government. Her uncompromising stance in the face of authority marks her squarely as a Scorpio-Sagittarius.

The Week of Independence

November 25–December 2

The Sagittarius I period takes Independence as its central image. According to The Grand Cycle of Life, this period can be likened to the time, just following the second Saturn return at age fifty-six (see Scorpio-Sagittarius cusp), in which a desire for a new kind of independence manifests in the middle-aged adult. The emphasis here is on striking out on one's own, perhaps devoting more energy to oneself and a bit less to family or career. Joyfully embarking on a fresh path but building on areas of real interest from one's past is characteristic of this period.

The days that comprise Sagittarius I symbolically reveal a mature adult purposefully asserting an individualistic position, feeling renewed excitement in being alive, seeking more expansive horizons and perhaps relearning how to be alone (and enjoy it). All attempts to dampen or smother such impulses will be steadfastly resisted.

Sagittarius I's are hard to control. In many ways the most independent people of the year, those born in this week must feel free to act on their impulses and intuition. People who try to exercise power over them in personal relationships are in for a rough ride. When Sagittarius I's respect their spouse or living partner, they will cooperate, sharing their feelings and dividing the chores. When they feel that their respect has not been earned, though, or when it is lost, expect constant conflict and strife. Honor and trust are high on the Sagittarius I list of priorities; without these, they feel, life ceases to have meaning and reverts to the law of the jungle.

Sagittarius I's have a thing about fairness, expecting it not only of themselves but of others, too. Their nurturing side is particularly evident in their relations with animals, small children and the less fortunate members of society; they simply will not tolerate mistreatment of the dependent or helpless in their presence. They often act impulsively to protect the defenseless, without a thought for their own safety.

Those born in the Week of Independence try to project an air of self-assurance and confidence, but behind this facade there often lurks a sensitive and even insecure individual. This becomes quickly evident when they are put under stress, either through negative criticism or through some challenge to their character. In such situations Sagittarius I's can easily and instantaneously fly off the handle, drowning those around them with their anger. Those alert enough to see the storm clouds gathering will try to avoid unleashing the emotional thunderbolts of those born in this week.

Sagittarius I's have enormous willpower. The loyalty of Sagittarius I's is a matter not only of principle or of emotion but of stubbornness; sticking to their guns is a character trait. In fact, they very often get their way, simply because they allow no other possibility. Anyone deeply involved with a Sagittarius I is likely to know their highly competitive nature winning is essential for those born in this week. Learning to submit, and to accept defeat graciously, is not usually possible for these dynamic individuals. Those few who do learn this lesson may have succeeded in meeting their greatest challenge, and thereby in gaining a high degree of maturity.

Sagittarius I's can be unreasonable, but they are usually open to discussion. Actually, these quick, witty individuals thoroughly enjoy verbal repartee and debate.

"INDEPENDENCE"

This can become a problem if they reach a subject that sticks in their craw, when they can easily become contentious and argumentative. Friends know what subjects to avoid and how to smooth over rough spots through playfulness, but those meeting Sagittarius I's for the first time are sometimes taken aback by their forthrightness and their at times outrageous observations and proposals.

Many born in the Week of Independence have a greater need to give than to receive. Their generosity is directly related to their feelings of self-worth and self-esteem, for they have a need to see themselves as caring rather than needy people. There are also Sagittarius I's who are not at all bashful about stating their demands, and who will not object to being served by others. Both character types, however, will often occupy an indispensable position in their family: shouldering substantial responsibilities, but on their own terms, is extremely important to them.

Sagittarius I's generally have only one or two people—whether friend, mate, co-worker or family member—with whom they feel close enough to share their innermost thoughts. The bond between Sagittarius I's and their parents or their children is extremely deep, and may be considered a true friendship. Such soulmates know those born in this week as highly ethical individuals who value integrity and character more than anything else, except, perhaps, their freedom. A Sagittarius I who feels betrayed by a family member or close friend can go through untold agonies of evaluation, judgment or rejection. In these struggles, assessing the intentions of the person in question is usually of great importance.

Those who want to spend time with Sagittarius I's usually have to be able to keep up with them: their friends and lovers must share the fast pace they set, whether in sports, travel, work or hobbies. A special person for a Sagittarius I, however, may also be someone who sticks close to home or place of business. Those born in this week have an acute need for stability; an individual who is always there to return to may prove to be the anchor in their lives. Although most Sagittarius I's would be capable of living alone, and in fact are well suited to it, they will generally make a firm decision to be a person's spouse or living partner and then continue in that role, even if they outgrow the need for it.

Sagittarius I's are ardent and unconstrained in their emotional expression, particularly in the sexual arena. They make the intensity of their energy fully apparent to their partners, who will remember vividly the full-bodied encounters in which these types engage. Sagittarius I's take pride in their sexual desirability or prowess, often exhibiting quiet confidence in their ability to satisfy their partners. They are extremely giving of their feelings but demand a great deal in return.

ADVICE:

Strive to keep your emotions on an even keel. Beware of allowing yourself an overly high-minded or high-handed attitude. Keep control over your expectations and try to be more forgiving. There is nothing wrong with compromise, or with occasionally losing. Watch your tendency to exaggerate.

SAGITTARIUS I NOTABLES

Actress, singer, comedienne and entertainer Bette Midler fits the Sagittarius I model perfectly, with her highly independent and outrageous nature. Although her first film, The Rose, in which she gave a virtuoso performance as a rock star, was a huge success, the failure of her second film, Jinxed!, almost finished off her career.

BETTE MIDLER

However, she came a long way from the early 80s with hits such as Outrageous Fortune, Beaches, and The First Wives Club. Born on the same day as Woody Allen (and thus both Sagittarius I's), she interacted hilariously, and uninterrupted-ly, with him in Scenes from a Mall.

From gag writer to comedian to actor, playwright and film director, Woody Allen has steadily evolved in an increasingly creative and authoritative direction. But he did it in his own way and always made one demand wherever he worked—that he be given as high a degree of Independence as possible. Although his Sagittarius I temperamental and impulsive nature has frequently worked against him, Allen's intuitions have been right on the mark enough times to guarantee his continuing success. His oscillations between serious and comic films have upset some viewers and critics who think he should stick to one or the other, but the level of his brilliance in his signature low-budget productions has given him a high degree of freedom to express his personal vision in a manner practically unparalleled in modern film.

Certainly the sexiest grandmother in the entertainment business, Tina Turner just doesn't slow down as the years go by. Tina suffered for many years on a personal level through an abusive marriage and, typical of many Sagittarius I's, through lack of a stable force in her life. Since she turned to Buddhism in the 80s, she has established a rock-solid basis through chanting and meditation and a personal relationship that brings her a great deal of happiness. One of the most dynamic performers, Tina specializes in live concerts but won back-to-back Grammys 3 years in a row (1984-1986) for best Rock Vocal of the Year. In 1991 Turner was voted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame.

The Week of the Originator

December 3–10

The Sagittarius II period takes The Originator as its central image. This period can be compared in human terms to a time in middle age when independent impulses have paved the way for individual forms of expression. Ideally, at this juncture in life, a person can assert newfound feelings of newfound freedom in terms of inventive projects and original activities that reflect a truly unique and experienced outlook. The desire to let it all hang out reflects not only enthusiasm in being alive but also a lack of fearfulness regarding success or failure, winning or losing, even mortality.

The days that comprise Sagittarius II symbolically reveal a mature person having the courage to go for it in terms of simply being him/herself. A take-it-or-leave-it attitude, increased self-confidence and guts, and a minimum of self-consciousness and shame are typical of this period. Also, the courage to be transparent is characteristic here. Eccentricities and idiosyncrasies tend to manifest now which only intensify as old age approaches.

Sagittarius II's are different and are not afraid to show it. Among the more unusual people of the year, even the most apparently normal of them may come to seem a tad peculiar once you get to know them better. They rarely consider doing anything in any way but their own. It would be one thing if they were content with being different, but they usually expect others to understand them somehow. In consequence, Sagittarius I's commonly encounter rejection, which they must learn to handle without becoming frustrated or bitter. They usually become dependent on one or two close friends or family members for acceptance and emotional support.

Sagittarius II's need to realize that by taking the path of least resistance they will arouse the least opposition. Unusual occupations or co-workers will allow them to work in a way more suited to their idiosyncrasies. Many success-oriented Sagittarius II's will push to get ahead and rise to the top at any cost; this may be a result of their tremendous need to be accepted. Strangely enough, it is often only when the unpredictable individuals born in this week forget about success that they suddenly achieve it—as if by accident.

The most successful of those born in the Week of the Originator are those who can cash in on their own wacky way of seeing and doing things. True, some Sagittarius II's can get mired in frustration and self-pity, and may find their friends teasing them with jokes about their weirdness or strangeness; but for the most part they are proud of who they are, although perhaps unable to explain how they got that way. Even so, those born in this week have escapist tendencies, often feeling impelled to retreat or even flee from the problems and exigencies of everyday life. The danger that they will involve themselves in questionable activities or drug states is high, and an ever-present threat to their physical and mental health.

Those born in this week are often clever—good with their hands, quick with their minds, technically proficient in their principal pursuit. Whatever their eccentricities, success can be theirs for the asking. Their talents may lead them into overconfidence, however, and by overestimating their faculties and abilities they can slip and fall. They can be slow to learn this lesson. In fact becoming more realistic about themselves and the world around them is generally a struggle for Sagittarius II's, who often take on too many activities at once, and occasionally the wrong ones. A good working relationship as a member of a team, or perhaps the reliability of a practical business partner, may serve to ground and direct their energies, keeping them from becoming scattered.

This week sports its share of expressive and exhibitionistic individuals. Perhaps out of an inner drive to show people who they really are, Sagittarius II's can sometimes let aggression run riot, whether it be territorial, intellectual, sexual or emotional. Perhaps the greatest need of those born in this week is to turn some of their outwardly directed energy inward, and to develop their spiritual side. They will also benefit by seeking to understand others better, particularly by listening, and to expand their circle of friends and acquaintances. Engagement in humanitarian pursuits or community projects will help them to normalize their relations with their fellow human beings.

In general, Sagittarius II's will save themselves and others a great deal of agony by seeking out people who will appreciate their uniqueness and avoiding the effort to impress or be accepted by those who will not. This is true of both marriage and business partners. Those born in this week are liable to give their all for love, and sometimes to get hurt in the process. When young, they may experience more than average disappointment in romantic relationships; a common scenario involves idolizing someone who does not return their enthusiasm. A number of rejection notices from several different addresses may be necessary to make them more realistic about their feelings and choices. When they do meet someone who will love and understand them, their first response may be to push this person away, perhaps in disbelief. Once a bond of trust is formed, however, and particularly if that process has been long and difficult, Sagittarius II's may become emotionally fixated and clinging. Depending on the depth of the love felt, the other person can get nervous, and back off in fear. The Sagittarius II should be wary, then, of laying too heavy a weight on lovers or friends, and particularly of trying to convince them that they are the "only one who understands"—a burden that is almost certain to be counterproductive to the relationship.

Sagittarius II's have an intensely physical side that cries out for satisfaction. Because they tend to give themselves fully to their experiences, they make ardent lovers and appreciative mates and friends. Often extremely attractive, either in their person or their personality, those born in this week can be true heartbreakers. Yet their equally strong tendency to act irresponsibly or destructively may finally lead even the most patient of lovers to break up with them.

The art of cartoon animation in America is synonymous with the name Walt Disney. Although today Disney refers to a gigantic entertainment empire, it all began with Walt at the drawing board, as the Originator of Mickey Mouse, Donald Duck and friends. Disney created the first feature-length cartoon, Snow White and the

Seven Dwarfs, which had flawless synchronized sound. Pinocchio, Dumbo, Bambi, Lady and the Tramp and many other animated features followed. Giving a whole new spin to the archetypes of the collective unconscious, the Disney characters provided material that filled the dreams of American kids. Perhaps Disney's greatest artistic success was Fantasia, which featured both abstract and story-line visual creations inspired by and synched to Leopold Stokowski's performances of Stravinsky and other classical composers.

A recluse for many of her days, few in the village of Amherst, Mass., knew that Emily Dickinson wrote poetry. Regarded as the outstanding American woman poet, it is a bit shocking that almost all her poems were unpublished in her lifetime and completely unknown for years after her death. The peculiar nature and escapist tendencies of Sagittarius II's were magnified in Dickinson, but so was the unique creative expression that made her a true Originator. Preferring to live alone and never marry, Dickinson had secret relationships with three men in her life, the last of which, a Philadelphia clergyman named Charles Wadsworth, fanned the sleeping embers of her creativity to full flame.

Russian Expressionist painter, teacher and theorist Wassily Kandinsky characterized the kind of creative originality associated with the Sagittarius II period. Meeting the great challenge of those born in the Week of the Originator, Kandinsky was also able to turn much of his outwardly directed energy inward and develop his spiritual side, the fruits of which may be seen in his great work On the Spiritual in Art. A founding partner of the Blue Rider School with Franz Marc, Kandinsky was the leading spokesman for Expressionism for most of his life. In fact, some experts credit him as the most important figure in the formulation of nonfigurative, abstract and geometrical painting in modern art.

SAGITTARIUS III

The Week of the Titan

December 11–18

The Sagittarius III period takes The Titan as its central image. This period can be likened in human terms to the years of a person's early sixties, when, for many, retirement is just in sight (or already begun), and those who have asserted newfound freedoms seek to expand their horizons. At this time plans are often made for the coming years that reshape financial priorities, meet the challenge of filling in larger blocks of leisure time and allow the individual to follow highly imaginative and creative pursuits.

The days that comprise Sagittarius III symbolically reveal a mature person growing more attentive to physical considerations, and having time to perfect hobbies and avocational projects but also to soar imaginatively with all kinds of expansive thoughts and activities. For the first time since adolescence and young adulthood, many individuals feel free enough to make major choices that will shape their personal future.

Born in the Week of the Titan, Sagittarius III's think on a grand scale. Their minds are usually geared to big projects, whether planning a family get-together or mapping out a business strategy. Disliking pettiness in all forms, they see the total picture first, and generally avoid getting hung up on the details. Sagittarius III's are big-hearted, and give shamelessly, but are realistic enough to expect something in return.

Sagittarius III's reach for the stars, but they keep both feet solidly on the ground. Their ambitions and aspirations are firmly rooted in the here and now. Whether small or large of frame, they are physically imposing, and make their presence felt in any gathering. The persona they project is big, and hard to take in all at once. This feeling that they are difficult to walk around can also extend to the sense that they can't easily be gotten out of the way—can't be bamboozled by airy schemes or faulty reasoning. Those personally involved with these powerful individuals will inevitably have to reckon with playing a subordinate role.

It can be dangerous to come between Sagittarius III's and their goals, for once they have made up their mind they move with lightning speed. Their friends and family learn soon enough what a given mood foretells—quiet or action. The people who get along best with them try to read their emotional weather report at the beginning of the day, for it may well determine the outcome of any project at the day's end. The more disturbing aspects of Sagittarius III's may have to be overlooked or ignored in the cause of group harmony and effective action.

There are moody and disturbing elements to the Sagittarius III personality that may strain living and working relationships. If Week of the Titan people are depressed, they are hard to budge. They often internalize external pressures and may, in consequence, exhibit chronic (rather than acute) physical and mental symptoms. Those close to them will eventually have to try to cheer them up, or get them to take a more positive view of their lives, but often to no avail—for Sagittarius III's actually find these dark moods an essential way of withdrawing from the world to chew things over. Extremely thoughtful, they can ruminate over a problem or plan for weeks or months before finally coming up with a solution. In this activity they are best left alone.

Since the emotions of Sagittarius III's come from a very deep place, their eruptions of feeling can be nothing short of volcanic. It is extremely important, then, that they spend time with people who are sympathetic to them, and with whom they can periodically unburden themselves by discussing whatever is on their mind. Like a pressure cooker, smoldering crater or grinding tectonic plate, they need to let energy loose in small doses if they are to avoid being shaken apart by the "big one." Complaining is actually healthy for those born in this week, and those who understand them welcome their occasional fussing and grumbling; the alternative is a good deal worse.

Those born in this week are drawn to magical and ecstatic experiences, not only in their personal lives but also in their careers. What basically attracts them, after all, is the impossible challenge, and they love to pull off miracles both minor and major before their astonished colleagues' eyes. Yet these Titans cannot be called competitive, since there seems to be so little to fear from their fortified citadels that no real competition is possible. That outlook may seem egotistical, but it gives some idea of the self-confidence and assurance of Sagittarius III's.

And yet, behind the massive bulwark of their personality, somewhere in a remote back passage lurks insecurity. This is their greatest enemy. A wee voice still murmurs from time to time, Are you really as rock-solid as you seem? The answer, of course, is no, but the world is usually fooled until a crack appears in the Mount Rushmore-like facade. Everyone has some kind of insecurity, of course, so it should come as no surprise that Sagittarius III's do, too; what is important, however, is their inability to recognize or deal with it. This lack of self-awareness may be the high price they pay for their peace of mind.

The most successful lovers and mates of those born in the Week of the Titan are often those who can weave a magical spell around them, after first lulling them into letting their guard down. Sagittarius III's actually enjoy being enchanted by those very special individuals who can lighten their ponderous workload or their crushing personal responsibilities. The mates of Sagittarius III's will benefit from their protective and capable ways but can also come to feel imprisoned, and may chafe under the feeling that the full expression of their own talents and abilities is denied.

Sagittarius III's are so focused and single-minded by nature that there is usually little difficulty in distinguishing between their desires and their needs, which are in some cases identical. Those emotionally involved with them know what they demand, and usually face only one decision—comply or resist. Negotiation or compromise is not in the picture. Still, like the giant in a fairy tale, Sagittarius III's can be fooled, often without finding out about it until later.

The giant of post-WWII Russian literature, Alexander Solzhenitsyn presents a titanic view of Soviet Russia and, in particular, of Stalin's brutal system of camps known as the Gulag, in which untold millions died. Imprisoned for years himself, Solzhenitsyn wrote directly from his own experience. After recovering from

His largest works are August 1914 and the mammoth Gulag Archipelago, for which he was banished from the Soviet Union. After living on a farm in Vermont, he was allowed to return to his

Epic, blockbuster, gargantuan—all describe the nature of the mammoth film productions of Steven Spielberg. Seeing things in the expansive Sagittarian manner does not preclude an eye for detail, however Spielberg is also a meticulous craftsman. Although he is a master at manipulating his audiences into believing the unbelievable, Spielberg can also deal masterfully with factual and historical material, as in the black-and-white masterpiece Schindler's List, which won seven Oscars. Nonetheless, it is probably for his fantasy films E.T., the Indiana Jones series, Close Encounters of the Third Kind and Jurassic Park that this highest-grossing

Norwegian stage and film actress Liv Ullmann was brought to worldwide attention by Ingmar Bergman, who starred her in several of his most important films. She lived with Bergman, described in her book Choices, published after she liberated herself from his tyrannical control and emerged as an individual in her own right. Physically imposing on the screen, Ullmann's moods and deep emotions are characteristic of those born in the Week of the Titan. She is able to portray a variety of states, from deep meditative contemplation to frightening psychological imbalance. Born on the birthday of Beethoven, Ullmann shares his affinity for the long line and monumental effort.

SAGITTARIUS-CAPRICORN CUSP

The Cusp of Prophecy

December 19–25

The Sagittarius-Capricorn cusp can be symbolically likened to the period around sixty-three years of age in the human life and also marks the beginning of winter in the northern hemisphere. During this period most of the land lies fallow, some animals go into hibernation, the winds blow cold, and on the winter solstice, the night is longer and the day shorter than at any other time in the year. This is the time at which druids at Stonehenge made astronomical observations and prophecies, and when fortunes were often cast. Indeed the Sagittarius-Capricorn cusp may be said to represent Prophecy.

In human development, at this juncture in life, middle age is drawing to a close and old age is about to begin. The emerging elder must face a time when traditionally his/her usefulness to the material world has lessened. However, the individual's usefulness in the spiritual sense may increase greatly, as a mentor and inspiration to others. The days that comprise this cusp exemplify some of the manifestations of Prophecy (using wisdom to look into the future), where the visionary, intuitive Sagittarius nature combines with the pragmatic, empirical nature of Capricorn.

Sagittarius-Capricorns are influenced by both the planet Jupiter (ruler of fiery Sagittarius) and Saturn (ruler of earthy Capricorn). The energies of these two planets are diametrically opposed: Jupiter stands for expansion, jollity and optimism, Saturn for contraction, seriousness and realism. A kind of push-pull effect is at work in the personalities of the unusual individuals born on this cusp—they may want to have fun, for example (Jupiter) but be too serious to do so (Saturn). Conversely, on another occasion, they may set out to buckle down to the job at hand (Saturn) but be lured by a new horizon (Jupiter). The more successful Sagittarius-Capricorns are able to integrate both these influences in their personalities.

The fiery and earthy natures of Sagittarius-Capricorns speak of highly developed faculties of intuition and sensation, respectively, but do not necessarily point to either a strong mental or a strong emotional orientation. Those born on this cusp are consequently at their best when trusting their hunches and their five senses, particularly sight and hearing. Their articulation and expression of their thoughts and feelings may be more problematical. Ultimately, the development of extrasensory abilities, or even a single sixth sense, is often the most unique and remarkable quality that those born on the Cusp of Prophecy can offer to the world.

Masters of the art of silence, those born on the Sagittarius-Capricorn Cusp have no need for speech to get their point across. It is often hard for them to get what they have to say into writing, or express it over the phone, and they may consequently feel that they have to deliver their messages in person. Whether happy, seductive, threatening or punishing, Sagittarius-Capricorns make their moods known very unambiguously, leaving little if any doubt about how they feel.

Those born on this cusp are at their best when they are confident of their powers but at the same time kind and understanding to others. They are at their worst when they feel self-pity, usually a result of worldly failure or of personal rejection. In some Sagittarius-Capricorns, feelings of hurt or frustration about something they are convinced they can do nothing about are psychologically gratifying, relieving them of the responsibility of taking positive action. In others, a militant attitude may be engendered when suppressed feelings burst forth and cause trauma. Put to a positive use, however, such energies can achieve creative and remarkable results.

Cassandra-like, those born on the Cusp of Prophecy do not expect to be liked by other people, although it often happens that they are. Being independent of the approval of others gives Sagittarius-Capricorns a power and freedom that many lack. On the other side of the coin, they may themselves like few of the people they meet, and may thus be seen as antisocial. There is generally speaking only one requirement for being a close friend to a Sagittarius-Capricorn, besides the fact that you like them: you must accept them without reservation for what they really are. Those born on this cusp have their antennae out to detect when others are flattering them or simply being polite, which doesn't cut the cake. Consequently, only a few individuals manage to get close to most Sagittarius-Capricorns.

For some Sagittarius-Capricorns there is a danger in all this, namely that, like children, they will repeat the somewhat exaggerated words "No one likes me" and will set up this motto as a self-fulfilling prophecy. They can make it come true by neglecting their physical appearance or, as adolescents, by being unresponsive. Many teenagers born on the Cusp of Prophecy appear quite introverted, and those who are more extroverted may have a greater need for recognition and approval—or, perversely, for rejection. Most often it is actions rather than words that are so outrageously expressed.

Those born on the Cusp of Prophecy may have rough childhoods due to conflicts with their parents, most often with the parent of the same sex. They themselves can make attentive and generous parents, but some run the risk, through identification, of making precisely the same mistakes their own parents did. Strong ties with siblings or other family members often carry over into adult life, however, and the success of these fraternal bonds may make those born in this week very comfortable relating to those younger than themselves as equals.

The deep, passionate natures and highly sexual orientation of those born on this cusp can bind others to them magnetically. Friends and lovers of certain

Sagittarius-Capricorns understand their need to be alone, and often gain great satisfaction from sharing a private or secluded life with them. Partners of the more outgoing Sagittarius-Capricorns, on the other hand, often provide a link between them and the world, and bring them out of their shell. The joy gained in watching a Sagittarius-Capricorn bloom socially may be considerable. Only one warning: there is always a chance that, Pygmalion-like, the partner who goes to this effort may finally be rejected when the Sagittarius-Capricorn "fair lady" (or gentleman) comes down off her or his pedestal and says good-bye.

Like many born on the Sagittarius-Capricorn cusp, Florence Griffith-Joyner did not need speech to get her message across but did it in a convincing physical manner. Winner of an incredible 3 gold and 1 silver medals at the 1988 Olympics, world record-holder Joyner impressed people as much with her beauty, grace and style as with her speed. Sharing the spotlight with her Olympic champion husband and sister-in-law, Al and Jackie Joyner-Kersey, has brought tremendous satisfaction to all concerned. The Florence Griffith-Joyner Youth Foundation has been set up to give disadvantaged young people opportunities denied to Florence when she was growing up in Los Angeles.

The Israeli psychic Uri Geller is the first of his profession to teach some of his secrets to the public at large and to encourage them, particularly children, to develop their own psychic abilities. Born on the Cusp of Prophecy, Geller not only predicts and influences the future but believes that if children could be taught in school to trust their psychic intuitions more, the future could be very different from the present. Geller's widely publicized paranormal abilities include not only his legendary bending of spoons but also the undeniable gift to describe covered drawings at a distance and to move objects. A devoted family man, his Sagittarius-Capricorn qualities are a mixture of the fun-loving and the serious elements of life.

French songwriter and chansonnier Edith Piaf led a tragedy-filled life. Born in a bordello and blinded by meningitis as a child, brought a depth of expression to her art perhaps unsurpassed in French popular music. Her peculiar blend of an earthy and fiery nature identifies her as a typical Sagittarius-Capricorn. Sorrow seemed to be her lot in life, for aside from other disappointments in her personal life, she lost her lover, boxer Marcel Cerdan, in a plane crash. Although she first became famous for her nightclub performances, she later appeared on the international scene in films and recordings. Her most famous hit was La vie en rose, which became her trademark song.

The Week of the Ruler

December 26–January 2

The Capricorn I period takes The Ruler as its central image. According to The Grand Cycle of Life, this period corresponds to the human age when most people prepare to retire from the working world. The emphasis here is on taking control of one's life, making decisions about one's day-to-day activities without career restraints. Those who choose to continue their careers may do so with a greater feeling of control and autonomy. As elders, those of this age may exert a kind of rulership in family matters, assuming a patriarchal or matriarchal role.

The days that comprise Capricorn I symbolically reveal the elder displaying survival toughness, taking command, finding new areas of service, and deepening aesthetic and spiritual interests.

Highly dependable, Capricorn I's are able to assume many of the responsibilities of daily life without complaint. Not necessarily leaders, they often assume the position of ruler by default, or take over because they can't bear to watch the way others are running things. Ruling their family, business, department or social organization is their forte, and they are excellent at delegating responsibility and seeing that things run smoothly, to the mutual advantage of all concerned.

To unseat a Capricorn I from any executive position is extremely difficult. Indeed, when those born in the Week of the Ruler give up their authority because of ill health, say, or are forced to step down due to allegations of mistakes, personality clashes or a need for younger blood, they take it pretty hard. Dealing with loss of face, status and power is generally the most difficult challenge they face.

Sensation

When Capricorn I's speak, they expect others to listen. They are often authoritarian types, and their high opinions of themselves and of their ideas may, in extreme cases, approach a belief in their own infallibility. Even if their spouse is an accepting or submissive person, they may have problems with children and other family members who will not endure their strictness and dogma so readily. Indeed, conflicts and rebelliousness may rage out of hand in their families, with the Capricorn I's setting ironclad rules, issuing ultimatums, uttering threats and generally making daily life difficult for children or relatives who simply do not agree with them. Capricorn I's can make powerful weapons out of guilt and shame.

Many Capricorn I's, of course, are not tyrants at all, and exert highly positive influences on their families through their insistence on structure and on accepting personal responsibility. Even so, not all mates are willing to accept Capricorn I rule, and the best solutions are often those in which each partner has his or her own domain. The pragmatic side of those born in this week allows them to see the value of such a division of labor. In addition, the recurring power struggles that feature in some Capricorn I families are replaced in others by the stimulating exchanges of ideas that develop when each partner makes suggestions about the other's work. There is usually a limit, however, to the amount of debate a Capricorn I will tolerate, and they will not usually submit to criticism of their basic principles.

Ultimately, those born in the Week of the Ruler are even more attached to ideologies and ethics than to common sense. Thus they may occasionally lose touch with those around them. Even long-standing friendships can collapse overnight if Capricorn I's feel their morals have been breached, or they confront financial irresponsibility or outright underhandedness. They also subject their love relationships to similarly rigorous standards of trust and honesty.

Money is generally very important to Capricorn I's, who know its power and how to put it to work. Shrewd calculators, they can have an instinct for turning a profit. These are the people you want to have around to analyze the deficiencies of a failed company, or to get a bankruptcy back in the black. Reorganizers, Capricorn I's have a special genius for improving the efficiency of any group, whether social or business. Yet their honesty and sense of fairness may undercut their own ambitions by hindering them from reaching the top of their profession. This might not be a problem if Capricorn I's weren't ambitious. They are, however, and consequently are often caught in a bind. Many born in this week find a comfortable career niche for themselves and stay there. Thus they too often settle for second best, much to the frustration of their family and friends, who know what their talents are.

Acceptance does not come easily to Capricorn I's. It is not that they are bigoted or prejudiced—quite the contrary. Capricorn I's are admirable in their willingness to oppose injustice fearlessly. Overall, they have a very healthy respect for tradition; they are more oriented toward making improvements in a given system than in tearing it down. Rarely will they reject a time-tested solution. Yet they also keep abreast of all the latest developments in society or their professional field.

Despite all this, the people born in the Week of the Ruler may have a hard time being open to the individuality of those close to them. Stern taskmasters, Capricorn I's may expect their mates and children to understand that there is only one way to be. Too often, that way is simply the Capricorn I way. In fairness, however, their viewpoint is seldom arbitrary; most often it reflects values of hard work and excellence of achievement. Capricorn I's have workaholic tendencies, and expect others to work at least as hard as they do. Goofing off, cowardice, low morals and laziness are the four sins that those born in this week would condemn most emphatically.

Emotional expression does not come easily to those born in this week; often creatures of deep feeling, they can get all wrapped up inside a cocoon of repressed emotion. Since love relationships are a direct means of liberating such feelings, their mates and lovers may be indispensable for their mental and physical health.

Capricorn I's are usually extremely faithful—they may be tempted to stray from their primary relationship, but they generally choose to stay. Although not overly sentimental, they can be quite affectionate, and they often sublimate more passionate drives into feelings of friendship for dear ones. Associates of those born in this week know them as caring, concerned and trustworthy individuals.

ADVICE:

Let others take the lead more often. You may be wise, but remember that wise men learn more from fools than fools from wise men. Work hard at trying to admit mistakes when you make them. There is no particular merit in holding on to an outworn creed or outdated idea.

CAPRICORN I NOTABLES

Impeccably trained at the drama school of Max Reinhardt and the Berlin Music School, German actress and singer Marlene Dietrich became an overnight international hit after her legendary film appearance in The Blue Angel. A seductive vamp, and a dangerous one, her role in the film draws on Dietrich's Capricorn I power and her imperious, strict and coldly-detached manner. Ironically, Dietrich, who had been offered a lot of money by Hitler to make Nazi films, wound up entertaining American troops during WWII, in a kind of hardheaded retaliation typical of one born in the Week of the Ruler. Sexy and highly intelligent, Dietrich acted in American films for some of the greatest directors and opposite the leading actors of her day.

The life of American writer Henry Miller can be divided into three parts, according to where he lived—New York, Paris, California. In each of these settings Capricorn I Miller did not really change a lot from his normal dogmatic and crusty self, but his viewpoints about life and his writing did. For the early Tropic of Cancer and Tropic of Capricorn he was accused of being a degenerate, and in the later Big Sur and Oranges of Hieronymus Bosch, he sounds more like a flower child. In all his work his lust for life and strong command of the language are evident. Many of his works were banned for years as obscene and could only be obtained with some difficulty.

Born in the Week of the Ruler, Mao Zedong was chairman of the People's Republic of China from 1946, when he drove Chiang Kai-shek's armies from the mainland, until his death in 1976. As a young man of 18, Mao joined the revolution against the Manchu

MAO ZEDONG

Dynasty and in 1921 took part in forming the Chinese Communist party. His Capricorn I patience and toughness was evident in the 6,000-mile Long March to Shensi Province, where the Red Army could regroup against their enemies. For the last 30 years of his life, Mao strove to implement his social ideas, culminating in the Cultural Revolution, in which all opposition, real or imagined, was ruthlessly stamped out. The tenets of Maoism were distributed throughout the world in the form of the Little Red Book.

The Week of Determination

January 3–9

The Capricorn II period takes Determination as its central image. This period can be related in human terms to the time of life when an elder seeks to develop new interests and is, ideally, free to explore them. A greater universality and a deepening of outlook now manifest strongly. Illnesses may have to be overcome; the ability to come back from physical setbacks, and a positive outlook, which lends psychological resiliency that are crucial here.

The days that comprise Capricorn II symbolically reveal the elder engaged in new explorations, having the time to travel, formulating philosophical or religious points of view, substantiating gains already made, and manifesting ambition (perhaps for further wealth and power, perhaps for more personal and spiritual goals). During this time the individual seeks the very best for him/herself.

Those born in the Week of Determination often have the drive and ambition necessary to reach the top of their profession. Whether or not they succeed, no one can fault them for not trying. Capricorn II's are strivers, like the mountain goat who seeks out the highest crags. Once embarked on a course of action, they are extremely difficult to dissuade from their plans. No matter how great or modest their gifts, Capricorn II's make the most of their abilities and stretch their talents to the outer edge of the envelope.

Capricorns are generally pictured as hard-headed, down-to-earth thinkers, but those born in the Week of Determination are often interested in theoretical, even metaphysical, religious or spiritual subjects and practices. Nor are their ideas in these areas at all conservative; they may, in fact, be rather radical. No idea is too strange or far out for Capricorn II's to at least consider, and they have an undeniable tendency to let their minds range over the broadest questions of cosmology and human existence. This philosophical bent, however, is usually based on fact and observation, for Capricorn II's have little time for idle or ill-founded speculation.

Capricorn II's often appear tough and aggressive, but most are highly sensitive, perhaps hypersensitive, underneath. They react strongly to criticism, often with denial. Although acutely aware of the disapproval of others, however, they usually have the strength to continue along their path if they believe in their heart that they are right. Of course, there are also immoral Capricorn II's who get away with as much as they can whether they can justify it or not, for they know something about power and how to wield it. They may be vulnerable to using slightly underhanded or unscrupulous methods. Even the more idealistic, who put their energies into serving a cause or organization, may wind up making questionable judgment calls. Classically, Capricorn II's often believe the end justifies the means.

They usually despise weakness in almost any form, and will not hesitate to use the deficiencies of those around them to their advantage. Such a person can only view personal failure as the ultimate humiliation. To say that Capricorn II's are unprepared for failure is an understatement: for many born in the Week of Determination, in fact, admitting failure is not really a possibility. In their philosophy, defeat is only a temporary setback, and the very weapons that destroyed their project must be used to rebuild it. Letting go of or giving up on something can be extremely difficult in these circumstances. It may be years, then, before Capricorn II's can free themselves of the baggage of the past that they carry on their able shoulders. On the other hand, they are capable of taking big chances at crucial points in their lives, in this way appearing as those prototypes of success who dare to fail.

In a strange way, Capricorn II's are masters of both reality and illusion, for many are so persuasive that they can convince others that an illusion is in fact reality. If those born in this week come to believe in their own illusions, however, they may become ineffectual in that they lose their credibility with those around them. Thus a single good friend who refuses to be conned and has the courage to report what he or she has seen, honestly and objectively, may be the most valuable resource a Capricorn II can have.

In their personal lives, Capricorn II's are happiest when they have a partner with whom to share the joys and sorrows of everyday life. They can live alone but most often choose not to do so. They may well insist, however, that their work is an inviolable area that they have no duty to share with their mate, who may get the idea that he or she occupies only second place in the Capricorn II's heart—that work comes first with these individuals. Consequently, those born in this week should consequently avoid involvements with dependent types who need attention and are unable to keep their nose out of their mate's business. It is not at all uncommon for Capricorn II's to marry a spouse whose work has little, if anything, in common with what they do themselves.

On the other hand, the friends of Capricorn II's are often colleagues, or at least work on similar pursuits. Extremely close relationships may develop with such individuals, and mates must accept this or face unhappiness, jealousy or feelings of rejection. Many Capricorn II's come to lead three quite separate and mutually exclusive lives: their work life, their social life and their intimate personal life. They may have no interest in integrating these areas, and, indeed, it is often unnecessary for them to do so.

Extremely resourceful, those born in this week are good at making the best of a bad situation. This and their loyalty enable them to hang in there for years trying to make a difficult or even somewhat undesirable relationships work out. What motivates them is less sympathy with or understanding of their partner than a refusal to admit failure. A Capricorn II can be extremely devoted not so much to a person as to the relationship itself, and to a belief in the concept of marriage or living together.

As realistic as they are, Capricorn II's are often seen as idealistic and even at times naive. Naiveté, in fact, can be considered their Achilles' heel, but also may be a reason for others to love or feel fondness or sympathy for them. Being vulnerable and admitting to weakness is essential to sharing love, and many born in this week handicap themselves by maintaining a strong facade.

CAPRICORN II NOTABLES

Republican President Richard Nixon was probably the most controversial individual to occupy the White House in this century. Typical of those born in the Week of Determination, Nixon took the talents he had been given and drove them mercilessly to the extreme in order to realize the high goals he had set for himself. In typical

RICHARD NIXON

Capricorn II fashion, nothing was permitted to get in the way of Nixon's power drives or to thwart his ambition. Although credited with ending the Vietnam War and establishing U.S. relations with China, Nixon was never really trusted by a large percentage of the electorate. Finally brought down for his role in the Watergate scandal, he resembled a figure in Greek tragedy who destroyed himself through his own overweening pride and arrogance.

Leaders of the intellectual left and the existentialist movement in France, Simone de Beauvoir and Jean-Paul Sartre were lovers, colleagues and friends. De Beauvoir taught philosophy until 1943, when she turned to writing. Thereafter, she gave an accurate picture of the first half of the 20th century in autobiographical works. It was in her later nonfiction, however, that she achieved her greatest international fame, particularly The Second Sex, her analysis of the role of women in society. Another cause was that of the elderly, and her book The Coming of Age attacks social attitudes toward senior citizens.

SIMONE DE BEAUVOIR

A student of drama with Stella Adler and of dance with Martha Graham, Alvin Ailey formed his own dance company in 1958. One of Ailey's earliest and most successful works was Revelations, set to African-American spirituals. His most important solo piece, Cry, was choreographed for Judith Jamison and is dedicated to “all Black women everywhere—especially our mothers.” Ailey had the tough exterior and hypersensitive interior of many Capricorn II's, accompanied by their interesting mix of realism and idealism. During his lifetime he created some 80 works, which were performed by many American dance companies, including the Joffrey Ballet and American Ballet Theater. Considered one of America's leading choreographers, Ailey was frequently praised for his belief in universal and multiracial brotherhood.

The Week of Dominance

January 10–16

The Capricorn III period takes Dominance as its central image. According to The Grand Cycle of Life, this period can be likened in human terms to a person's late sixties, when the wish to be dominant can manifest strongly. As long as such urges are expressed in technical areas, they are likely to bring positive results. However, in the personal sphere, the desire to rule the roost may cause strife with one's life partner, who may be thinking the same way. Not uncommonly, such conflicts can be the result of both people having too much time around the same house. Successful elders focus more of this powerful energy inward—particularly in acquiring greater control over wayward emotions, wasteful impulses and unrestrained fantasy. The days that comprise Capricorn III symbolize the energy of the elder seeking to order his/her environment by making realistic assessments and hard choices, while seeking greater comfort, happiness and fulfillment.

Many Capricorn III's find it unnecessary to rise to the top of their field, or even to lead, as long as they can express their dominance within the day-to-day dynamic of their family, work or social group. Although ambitious types may well be born in this week, Capricorn III's often reach a certain level in their particular circle and are content to stay there for the rest of their lives. They have tremendous diligence and dedication, which enable them to stick to the path they have set for themselves without being sidetracked.

Self-confidence is extremely important to the psychic well-being of Capricorn III's. As long as they are not beset by worry, do not probe too deeply into their own motives or expect too much of themselves, they function well. A secret inferiority complex may plague them for years, however, until they can prove to themselves that they really are worthwhile people. Some born in this week may be unrealistic about their capabilities, overrating themselves—a desperate attempt to deny their deep feelings of inferiority, and one that can only set them up for failure. Those with a poor self-image often still suffer from the negative attitudes of a disapproving or overly demanding parent in childhood.

When young, Capricorn III's are prone to idolize an older figure of the same sex. As they grow more mature, they themselves are often cast in a heroic mold by others. Idolizing and idealizing can build up the expectations surrounding Capricorn III's to an unrealistic extent, again setting them up for the inevitable disappointment of a fall from grace. A strongly moral attitude, and a tendency to divide the world into good or evil, are characteristic of those born in this week; they need to learn not to judge others or be so extreme in their views. The happiest Capricorn III's are those who can take people as they are without rejecting them or laying on trips of guilt or shame.

Those born in the Week of Dominance are highly physical but not always sensuous or pleasure-loving. Some of them may make the overcoming of physical wants and needs their chief occupation, in fact, showing their dominance over their own feelings and bodies. Capricorn III's can be severe in dealing with themselves and with those close to them, notably their mates and families. Yet they can generally be counted on for honest and straightforward opinions and advice. Rarely prone to unconscious self-deceit, they also have little interest in deceiving others; most often they mean what they say and say what they mean.

Capricorn III's value service highly. They are competent and thoroughly professional, but their giving attitudes may make them too self-sacrificing, or vulnerable to exploitation. Although they are capable of learning from such experiences how to say no to co-workers and acquaintances, they may still be unable or unwilling to deny the demands of their immediate family. Years of devotion to a needy family member can not only drain them of their energy and deprive them of time for themselves but also cause the buildup of tremendous frustrations, which, inevitably, produce unhappiness.

Capricorn III's are thoughtful people and can also be a great deal of fun. Their playful attitudes and scathing wit show their ability to put things in perspective and also to not take themselves too seriously. There is an undeniable streak of eccentricity in many born in this week. Although not overly social, they often like nothing better than an evening with friends, whether quiet or uproarious, depending on their mood. Capricorn III's enjoy being part of a group, sharing experiences and conversation with several individuals equally; they are less prone to have one single best friend. They are often attracted to team sports, hobbies or clubs, and may contribute wholeheartedly to the planning and maintenance of such organizations.

In their careers, many Capricorn III's are hard workers. They often get their biggest kicks battling against high odds—for example, by struggling to overcome physical disabilities. Others born in this week are more realistic in the projects they take on but nonetheless show workaholic tendencies. A vivacious and interesting mate can be good medicine for those born in this week, taking their minds off career concerns and allowing them to relax and have fun. Capricorn III's often need someone at home who can lighten their mood when they walk in the door.

Although responsible, Capricorn III's are not dull by any means. Many born in this week have an arresting, even electric demeanor that can be highly charismatic, or at the very least can cause others to watch them in wide-eyed astonishment. Those born in this week rarely try to be outrageous, but they often wind up like that anyway. Capricorn III's are often unaware of the effects their statements and actions have on others, and basically may not care, either. They don't feel rejection keenly, partly because they know they aren't everyone's cup of tea, partly because they generally don't have a great need for the approval and acceptance of others. Self-contained, those born in this week must be careful not to keep too much under control, stifling their more expressive side.

ADVICE:

Don't be afraid to take chances. If you do not dare to fail you may not achieve your true heart's desire. Your insistence on security may be misplaced at times.

Try to be more flexible where the feelings of others are concerned.

Do not assume that your values have absolute or universal application.

In her best film performances, Faye Dunaway shows the kind of dominant attitudes and eccentricity that are characteristic of Capricorn III's. In roles opposite Warren

FAYE DUNAWAY

Beatty in Bonnie and Clyde and Jack Nicholson in Chinatown, Dunaway displays not only her beauty and fine acting but also her flair for the unusual. Such feeling for more bizarre roles is reflected in her incredible portrayal of actress Joan Crawford in Mommie Dearest and opposite Mickey Rourke in Barfly, where she plays a wealthy drunk. Dunaway has also been able to express her dominant side as a film producer, notably in 1990, with Cold Sassy Tree.

The legendary story has been told many times of how the young Greek immigrant Aristotle Onassis arrived in Argentina with only a few hundred dollars in his pocket. Showing the hard-working characteristics and single-mindedness of those born in the Week of Dominance, Onassis became a millionaire by the time he was 25, working first in the tobacco business and then using his profits to buy ships. By the time he met Jackie Kennedy, shipping magnate Onassis had amassed one of the largest fortunes in the world. Jackie and Onassis wed in 1968, and although many were bewildered by her choice, few could deny the power and self-assurance of her Capricorn III husband.

The origins of George I. Gurdjieff, founder of an important 20th-century spiritual movement, are shrouded in mystery. Having spent the first 40 years of his life in central Asia, Tibet, India and the Middle East studying the wisdom of several mystical and religious groups, Gurdjieff appeared in Russia and established his Institute for the Harmonious Development of Man with the help of his followers. Forced by the Russian Revolution to relocate outside Paris, Gurdjieff's Institute was able to spread the master's ideas to a larger public. His books Meetings with Remarkable Men and Tales of Beelzebub attracted great interest over the years, although it was disciple P.D. Ouspensky's book In Search of the Miraculous that popularized Gurdjieff's ideas. Gurdjieff possessed the electrically dominant demeanor but also the fixed moral orientation that characterize many Capricorn III's.

CAPRICORN-AQUARIUS CUSP

The Cusp of Mystery and Imagination

January 17–22

The Capricorn-Aquarius cusp can be likened symbolically to the period around seventy years of age in the human life; it arrives at the time in winter when the days are lengthening but remain cold in the northern hemisphere. Indeed, nights are freezing and refuge must be sought inside. The Capricorn-Aquarius cusp may be said to represent Mystery and Imagination. In human development, at the age of seventy, one must certainly come to terms with one's own mortality. Preparations must be made to make one's remaining years comfortable but also productive and satisfying. Although external activities have usually slowed down considerably, ideally a corresponding increased tempo of the interior life—mental, emotional, spiritual—can manifest. The worlds of imagination, fantasy and dreams are active, and some feel and act in a childlike manner. The days that comprise the Capricorn-Aquarius cusp exemplify some of the manifestations of Mystery and Imagination where the practical, conservative Capricorn nature clashes with unpredictable, unconventional Aquarian impulses.

The vivid and expressive individuals born on the Capricorn-Aquarius cusp generate excitement wherever they go. Unable to keep out of the action for very long, they make their presence felt almost immediately on entering a room. Their viewpoints tend to be controversial, and whether conservative or radical are highly stimulating, often because of the dramatic way they are delivered. Capricorn-Aquarians' interest in the poor and downtrodden is more than theoretical: most of them will not hesitate to make direct contributions of time, money or energy to help anyone less fortunate than themselves.

At the same time, however, they have little sympathy for those they see as free-loaders or parasites, able to pull their own weight but refusing to do so.

The influence of the planet Saturn (ruler of Capricorn) lends structure and a feeling of responsibility to Capricorn-Aquarius personalities, but the unpredictable energy of Uranus (ruler of Aquarius) may tend to break this order apart at any moment. It is not uncommon for Capricorn-Aquarians to have wide mood swings; they can appear sensible and reasonable one moment, uncontrolled the next. Capricorn-Aquarians can get pretty wild, so it is not surprising that violence can feature in their lives, whether they attract it or enact it. Chaotic, out-of-control energies can produce tremendous unrest in the lives of those born on this cusp. Their regard for their personal safety is usually not high, a trait they may reinforce with a daredevil nature—a deadly or at least dangerous combination. A disregard for their health in general, and an insistent confidence that their prodigious energies will bail them out, time and time again, can wear them down over the years, or induce chronic physical conditions. Concerned mates and lovers may have a hard time, for example, weaning them away from heavy drinking and smoking.

Capricorn-Aquarians have a pronounced dark side. Not ones to keep anger inside for very long, they can explode in fits of temper that will send others scurrying. The image of a furious Capricorn-Aquarius hell-bent on punishment is at tremendous variance with the face they present when enjoying themselves and having fun. More than most, those born in this week can be at the mercy of their demons, so that their outbursts of temper are truly spontaneous. Because they are rarely calculating, it is hard to blame them for their tremendous mood swings, which are usually forgiven, though not easily forgotten, by those closest to them.

Even the most settled and conventional of Capricorn-Aquarians will often have an active dream and fantasy life. They lead a kind of Walter Mitty existence, with few guessing the extent of their interior life or the degree of its inventiveness. Everyday situations can prove the springboard for bizarre mental gyrations, in which the Capricorn-Aquarian becomes the central character in an imaginary world. These flights of fancy rarely indicate pathological states—quite to the contrary, those born on this cusp show how important being in touch with one's fantasy life can be for mental health.

Capricorn-Aquarians love to tell and play jokes. Their mates, friends and family must not only understand but appreciate this need if those born in this week are to be kept happy. It isn't always easy, however, to keep up with Capricorn-Aquarians, who may one moment be dealing seriously with day-to-day problems, the next exploding in riotous laughter. They also have a conventional side that can make them extremely exacting: they generally expect all family members to do their duty and discharge their obligations to the fullest.

Those born on this cusp can only fully respect people who share daily chores and duties with them fairly.

“MYSTERY AND IMAGINATION”

Capricorn-Aquarians often seek hard-working, dependable mates rather than beautiful or intelligent ones. Outside their permanent or primary relationship, however, the impulsive Capricorn-Aquarius may be magnetically attracted to vivacious and exciting individuals, or to quieter but still passionate types. The sexual powers of those born on the Cusp of Mystery and Imagination are usually high, and their interest in sex is pronounced. When they stray, they suffer to an extent from guilt, but this can lend extra spice to their indiscretions. Although they may attach little importance to such flings, their partner may not be so understanding, and deep, long-lasting hurts may be inflicted. In their sexual and other escapades, Capricorn-Aquarians exhibit an immature side, like Peter Pan, who refused to grow up.

Those born on this cusp do not necessarily age well; many risk burnout in their tumultuous lifestyles, others deteriorate through neglect or abuse of their bodies. Haste and carelessness may not only wear them down physically but contribute to psychological instability. On the other hand, those Capricorn-Aquarians lucky enough to have a stable support group, whether in family, friends or, a mate, can have it all, establishing the many facets of their personalities. Capricorn-Aquarians who live alone may, in fact, build up great inner strength through dealing with the most difficult and elusive customer they have ever met—themselves.

CAPRICORN - AQUARIUS CUSP NOTABLES

The former heavyweight boxing champion Muhammad Ali typified the vivid expressiveness and the activity and violence that frequently characterize those born on the Capricorn-Aquarius cusp. It was Ali's speed, dancing style and rope-a-dope techniques that set him apart from other heavyweights, but his ability to take a punch and hit hard were never seriously questioned. Ali has attracted as much attention out of the ring as in, particularly when he joined the Nation of Islam and later refused induction into the U.S. Army. Ali decisively defeated some of the toughest fighters of his day, including Joe Frazier and George Foreman, winning the respect of fight fans the world over. His inimitable speech was frequently punctuated by "I am the greatest."

Janis Joplin characterized the vivacious, impulsive and wild nature of many born on the Cusp of Mystery and Imagination. Joplin lived the years of the 60s perhaps more intensely than any other major rock star. In large outdoor concerts she mesmerized thousands by her incredible intensity, which pushed her voice and body to the most painful limits. Me and Bobby McGee and Lord, Won't You Buy Me a Mercedes Benz were trademark songs, although it is unlikely the Almighty was moved by Janis's plea. Fronting Big Brother and the Holding Company and the Kozmic Blues Band, Janis conveyed her blues-oriented music with highly charged emotion. Her drug-related death in 1970 at 27 came, symbolically, as the 60s drew to a close.

Italian film director Federico Fellini began his work in the neorealist cinema but could not resist the pull of fantasy and imagination felt so strongly by those born on the Capricorn-Aquarius cusp. His first masterpiece, La Strada, which starred his wife, Giulietta Masina, shows how much the director's symbolic imagery had suffused his cinematic vision. In La Dolce Vita and 8½, strongly autobiographical and social elements were added, making the films highly personal commentaries on the times. In both films, Marcello Mastroianni is Fellini's persona, wandering through the maze of his own visions. Juliet of the Spirits, again starring his wife, along with Satyricon and Amarcord revel in the use of color, fantasy and exploration of images from childhood to create Fellini's surreal world.

AQUARIUS I

The Week of Genius

January 23–30

The Aquarius I period takes Genius as its central image. According to The Grand Cycle of Life, this period can be symbolically likened to the years of a person's early seventies. At this time, a more universal understanding of nature, time and man has emerged. Having to impress others, struggling to accumulate money, striving for success, shouldering family responsibilities—for many, these are a thing of the past. Time can be spent reading and thinking, and perhaps considering philosophical matters or areas of social or international concern. Ideally, wisdom has crystallized, for the outlook of a person this age is now somewhat fixed. The days that comprise Aquarius I symbolically reveal the elder facing advanced age and coming to the hard realization that not so many years may be left. Concerns of character, withdrawal from the world, thoughts about human destiny, but also memories of high points in life, for oneself and others—extraordinary scientific, philosophical or physical achievements—may be mentally surveyed.

Although Aquarius I's may not necessarily be more intelligent than others in the year, they generally learn quickly and exhibit an alert, even high-strung demeanor. Like thoroughbreds, they are hot-blooded types, usually champing at the bit to get on with it. Patience is not one of their virtues, and Aquarius I's show a marked itchiness with those slower sorts who need time to express themselves and make decisions.

Aquarius I's often arouse other people's amazement, and also jealousy, due to the speed and ease with which they pick things up at the first go. When they are young, this ability may manifest as precocity, but parents and teachers who do not understand them may criticize them as superficial, and for lacking the stick-to-it-iveness to see a project through. But although it is true that Aquarius I's are easily bored, they are quite capable of perseverance when they feel it is warranted. Not everyone born in this week has the ability to learn so fast, but most value mental skills highly and try to develop them, whether born with them or not. They also prize education, but not always the kind found in school: Aquarius I's believe that experience is the best teacher and are often self-taught types. The lure of worldly excitement will often entice them away from the classroom, and travel to foreign lands can have a peculiar fascination for them.

In their careers, those born in this week want to have things their own way. They rarely do well in jobs where they are told what to do. Self-employment or independent positions suit them better, particularly if their work allows them the freedom to make choices, plan, change direction, follow their instincts and be true to what they believe. Although Aquarius I's can be excellent leaders, whether of families and social groups or in their professional environments, they have no essential need to either rule or dominate. Their greatest need in relation to other people may actually be just the need for attention, since every performer ultimately needs an audience.

It is extremely important for Aquarius I's to give every project they work on their own personal stamp. People who enjoy the individual expression of others are fond of those born in this week, but their often destabilizing and self-centered energies can affect group projects adversely. Aquarius I's often seem rebellious, but this is usually because of some attempt to tame or control them. Their impulsiveness can easily bring them into conflict with authority figures, or with those of a more conservative nature.

Once those born in this week accept their uniqueness and realize that their social needs and drives are less deep than they think, they will make great strides in their careers. More enlightened Aquarius I's may come to realize that they can use their strengths best by pursuing a career that does not necessarily involve social contact. There are many areas of science, music, art, publishing or economics that can fit the bill. Part of the problem Aquarius I's confront in working with others is that they tend to exhaust their talents and energies on those close to them, sometimes in a frustrated effort to fit in and feel that they really belong to a group.

On the negative side, the Aquarius I personality has a tendency to self-destructiveness. They are more hurtful to themselves than to others. They can be emotionally unstable, and at times can appear distracted, wired, self-absorbed, and can be easily upset. Their sensitivity to external stimuli may be pronounced in such moods, and they may have an acute need to withdraw to a quiet place, away from the bustle of the world. Easily stressed out, even prone to periodic breakdowns, Aquarius I's must learn to toughen themselves. If they can become less easily aroused, they will deal more effectively with the exigencies of everyday life.

In matters of love, Aquarius I's insist that their mates understand their need for freedom. They will not be tied down to fixed routines and schedules. Friends and lovers with more demanding expectations of them are in for a rude surprise;

Aquarius I's will rarely accept restriction. Chafing at constraint, they may just try to find another free spirit to get involved with, a solution that may work in the short term but seldom provides the stability and permanence required for deeper commitment. Some Aquarius I's may indeed desire a permanent, faithful, giving and stable partner but may also seek the freedom to carry on all kinds of other relationships, sexual or otherwise, at the same time. By practicing this kind of double standard, these Aquarius

I's seek to satisfy both their needs and their desires, but also show their disregard for others.

Those who choose family life will have to learn to direct their energies efficiently, share responsibilities, budget their time and, above all, conquer their need for attention. Their charismatic side often attracts the wrong kind of people, and this may keep their energy from those whom they love and who really need it, particularly family members. Restricting themselves to a well-chosen circle of close friends, and concentrating on those who have a stabilizing effect on them psychologically and are not needy people, will contribute greatly to their happiness.

ADVICE:

Clarify a realistic picture of yourself in your mind's eye. A certain amount of undesirable personal interaction is always necessary; try to be a bit more thick-skinned and, if necessary, downright insensitive. Cultivate calm, patience and persistence rather than always going your own way. Learn to handle frustration and be tough enough to quietly demand the very best for yourself.

A Q U A R I U S I N O T A B L E S

Certainly the most precocious musical prodigy the world has ever known, Austrian composer Wolfgang

MOZART

Amadeus Mozart exemplifies the dazzlingly quick abilities of those born in the Week of Genius. Yet perhaps the greatest struggle for Mozart was taking his place in the adult world, where values like maturity, responsibility and hard work were stressed. That he was successful artistically in his struggle can be seen in works like the operas Don Giovanni and The Magic Flute and in his late symphonies and piano concertos, although his personal life remained somewhat chaotic. Dead at 35 under mysterious circumstances, leaving an unfinished commissioned requiem, which proved to be his own, the prolific Mozart had already written enough masterpieces for a dozen lifetimes.

TV and film star Oprah Winfrey fits the pattern of precocity frequently found in Aquarius I's, who tend to give public performances at an early age. Her first notable appearance was delivering the Easter sermon in church at age 2. Oprah majored in speech and drama in college, was voted Miss Tennessee and by the age of 19 was already a local CBS anchor. Reportedly the highest-earning woman in America for several years now, Oprah can attribute her tremendous success to the empathic bond she has formed with her audience, partly due to her honesty about her own childhood and personal life. Oprah reaches out and touches her audience not only figuratively but literally, making the human bond even stronger. Her role in the film The Color Purple demonstrates her extraordinary versatility.

Elected U.S. president 4 times, Franklin Delano Roosevelt was possibly the most popular public figure in the 20th century. His New Deal reforms were credited with bringing America out of the Depression. As commander in chief, he guided the country in WWII and, more than anyone else, was responsible for winning the war. Although FDR fits the Aquarius I mold as impatient and itching to get on with implementing his latest schemes, he was also frivolous, reckless and overconfident when younger.

FRANKLIN DELANO
ROOSEVELT

Perhaps it was the polio that crippled and immobilized him in 1921 that was most responsible for allowing him to become more mature, thoughtful and compassionate.

AQUARIUS II

The Week of Youth and Ease

January 31–February 7

The Aquarius II period takes Youth and Ease as its central image. Paradoxically, this period can be related in human terms to the years of a person's early to mid-seventies. In fact, a bond with children may spring up at this time (particularly one's own grandchildren), and thus the maturity and wisdom of old age can mesh with the open and wonder-filled world of the child. At this stage of life very youthful impulses can surface—indeed, some report a kind of “second childhood.” Relaxing, taking it easy and in general having time on one's hands can be enjoyable now. The days that comprise Aquarius II symbolically reveal the elder dealing with old age and finding ways to fill his/her time with meaningful activity. Expressing a measure of eccentricity and willfulness, perhaps finding new friends of one's age, deepening relationships with children, universalizing one's thoughts, and maximizing one's comfort and happiness all manifest at this time.

“No hassles” could be the motto of most Aquarius II's. Listening to those born in this week, one would gather that they do not like trouble in any form and would do practically anything to avoid it. They value their happiness highly, both in the long term and in the short. Aquarius II's generally ask to be left alone to travel their own path with as little interference as possible. Not much interested in controlling others or meddling in their affairs, those born in this week are happy to accord the same treatment to other people that they demand for themselves.

Those born in this week have a tendency to virtuosity in their makeup: whether in the office, the laboratory, the building site or the kitchen, Aquarius II's display a mastery of their medium. Their craftsmanship is pronounced, and although they give the impression of performing their tasks effortlessly, years of hard work may well have gone into perfecting their technique. For many Aquarius II's, in fact, technique is not an end in itself but only a beginning, a means by which they can express their highest creativity.

Youthfulness of all kinds (physical, mental, emotional) is a characteristic of Aquarius II's. Not only do they often look far younger than their years, they may develop many of their full powers before the age of twenty, so that their abilities run throughout their lives rather than coming to them with age. In addition, children and childhood are often lifelong themes and preoccupations for them, whether they themselves become parents or not. They often hope to keep the natural qualities of the child—spontaneity, impulse, intuition and openness—alive in themselves to the end. Not surprisingly, those born in the Week of Youth and Ease are sometimes accused of emotional immaturity and superficiality. It's true that they are in some cases immature, but superficial they are not.

Aquarius II's tend to be so well-liked and admired that one might well wonder where their problems lie. But the popularity that is their strength can also be their undoing. For one thing, Aquarius II's can get hooked on other people's applause and, in particular, admiration of their free-and-easy approach. The consequence may be that they wind up spending most of their time pleasing others and fail to assert themselves for fear of losing their friends and fans. Other Aquarius II's may detach or even isolate themselves from those around them, for they find it hard or undesirable to have to live up to others' expectations. Some of these individuals risk becoming haughty, dispassionate people, with little real sympathy for their fellow humans.

Given their high opinion of themselves, Aquarius II's may be prone to conceit. On the other hand, since this self-evaluation is generally based on their outward talents and abilities—and ultimately, that is, on other people's attitudes and responses to them—it does not come from a deep place within themselves and, therefore, may cover up grave insecurities and doubts. A great danger for Aquarius II's is the chance that they may adopt values not their own and live out their lives through the expectations of others, depriving themselves of a healthy ego that can function well in everyday life. The development of strong, heartfelt and fiercely defended beliefs, culled from their own internal struggles and life experience, can help them to come of age and function as mature individuals.

It would seem then, that those born in this week must work on acquiring a more realistic self-image. It may also be possible for them to strike a balance between the sunnier and the darker sides of their personalities by getting to know themselves better and coming to grips with their demons. We often don't really need to confront and slay the dragon in our innermost depths; we just have to get to know it better and, ultimately, perhaps, to make it our friend. By recognizing such a source of vitality and owning up to it, Aquarius II's can actually empower themselves.

More out of choice than necessity, Aquarius II's may like to keep their relationships light, and to avoid serious or heavy involvements. But this should not be taken to mean that they cut themselves off from having their own families, long-standing love and marital relationships or steady friendships.

Those closely involved with them will learn that if Aquarius II's insist on keeping a distance, it is to guarantee their own autonomy. They will rarely seek to merge their personality with that of the other person. Those born in this week know that by avoiding deep emotional entanglements they may well spare themselves some of the pain of future conflicts and separations.

Problems arise when Aquarius II's discover that they are often attracted to the very opposite kind of personality from what they think they want. Paradoxically, those born in the Week of Youth and Ease may be magnetically drawn to and need to be involved with deep, profound, even troubled people. This need may reflect a psychological dynamic in which they fall in love with a projection of their own shadow side, of which they are otherwise unaware. Emotionally complex personalities certainly fascinate Aquarius II's but at the same time frustrate them. Watching some of the agonies and mental torture of this type of Aquarius II relationship, one wonders if the happy-go-lucky image these individuals seek to convey is really as accurate as it appears.

When fastballer Nolan Ryan retired from baseball in 1993, he had 5,714 strikeouts, a lifetime ERA of 3.19 and a record of 324 wins and 292 losses in 27 years in the major leagues. Although he is the all-time record holder for strikeouts and no-hitters, Ryan never was the Cy Young winner or an MVP. Youthful Ryan fits the Aquarius II mold perfectly, still throwing strikeouts easily when he was over 40. In one incredible season, 1973, Ryan pitched 2 no-hitters and in the 2nd one struck out 17 batters. In his last start that season, he struck out 16 batters and broke Sandy Koufax's season record by one strikeout! Between the ages of 33 and 41, playing for the Houston Astros, Ryan had a record of 106-94 and an ERA of 3.14.

The name of Russian ballerina Anna Pavlova is synonymous with beauty, elegance and grace. Her legendary performances with the Ballet Russe in Paris established her as one of the world's greats. A typical Aquarius II, the Youth and Ease Pavlova had in abundance held audiences spellbound, as she exhibited her flawless technique with seeming nonchalance and detachment. Pavlova established her reputation with the classic roles of ballet literature, notably Giselle and Chopiniana. Her most famous role with the Ballet Russe, the Dying Swan, was created for her by the choreographer Michel Fokine.

ANNA PAVLOVA

The virtuosity and mastery of his medium but also a detached and slightly haughty attitude identify Clark

Gable as an Aquarius II. Gable, as Rhett Butler in the film Gone With the Wind, infuriates Scarlet O'Hara with his conceit, and indeed this is the impression that Aquarius II Gable frequently gave. However, he was not called the "King of Hollywood" for nothing and personified the Hollywood leading man for 30 years. Ease characterized Gable's approach to most roles; difficulty, pain and suffering for his art were not really his modus operandi. His Aquarian inability to deal with his feelings was evident when he fell apart emotionally after his wife, Carole Lombard, died in a plane crash, and he escaped to the U.S. Air Force in WWII. He emerged as a real-life and highly decorated combat hero.

The Week of Acceptance

February 8–15

The Aquarius III period takes Acceptance as its central image.

This period can be symbolically likened to a time in a person's advanced age when a more accepting outlook has emerged. Many prejudices, preconceptions and judgmental attitudes have diminished in relevance and have perhaps been stripped away altogether. Although irritability and negativity can certainly rear their head at this late stage of life, many by this time have adopted a forgiving attitude toward themselves and the choices they have made, friends and loved ones—indeed, the world in general. For those who are religious, thoughts of the afterlife and a deepening sense of responsibility motivate charitable acts. Psychic powers, an enjoyment of the simple pleasures, humor and wisdom in thought and speech mark this time. Ideally, even those who may be struggling physically can manage to display a dignity and wholeness that is inspiring to younger people.

The theme of acceptance runs strong in the lives of Aquarius III's. Some of them are hardheaded and not particularly open to unusual ideas and people but become increasingly tolerant as the years go by. Others are overly accepting from an early age and allow themselves to be unduly manipulated or influenced by stronger, more selfish types. The challenge for Aquarius III's is to remain open to the world while at the same time retaining the ability to be selective in screening out harmful influences.

Having dealt with some of their own prejudices, Aquarius III's often become champions of the underdog. They despise intolerance and unfair treatment in any form. They also react instinctively against those who put on airs, or pretend to be something they are not. Poking holes in other people's balloons is often an Aquarius III specialty, and if they carry this tendency to an extreme, they can be extremely cutting and hurtful. The reasons for this behavior may be found in a low self-image, perhaps reflecting negative parental attitudes expressed toward them in childhood. Aquarius III anger is sudden and explosive but rarely lasts for long. Their friends and family usually realize that it is often better for all concerned if they can get their aggression and dissatisfaction out in one go rather than letting it simmer inside.

The resourceful individuals born in the Week of Acceptance are rarely at a loss for new ideas. Perhaps because they get themselves into difficult or challenging situations so often, Aquarius III's learn early on how to extricate themselves from dilemmas. That they often create and solve their own problems makes them like two mythological figures rolled into one: Daedalus, who created the labyrinth, and Ariadne, who showed Theseus how to get out of it. In a basic sense, Aquarius III's are their own worst enemy.

Rarely at rest for long, Aquarius III's love activity and movement. Their liveliness is an extremely positive trait as far as their friends are concerned, and they are often sought out for their attractiveness, unusual demeanor and colorful language. The downside of their character is more often felt by their families than by their associates, for it is in the daily task of living with others that their greatest problems often arise. Those born in this week may be constantly annoyed with family members, and because they do not rate high in self-awareness, they may fail to see that it is actually they who are the annoying ones.

Those born in this week are easily affected by what others say and do. A bad remark or look can easily set them on the wrong foot for a few hours or even ruin their whole day. Aquarius III's are particularly vulnerable to personal attack. They can stand any amount of criticism of their unusual ideas and, in fact, defend themselves well but may fly apart when dealing with people who can push their emotional buttons. Learning to be less vulnerable to ad hominem arguments, and to laugh off the negativity of others, whether it is intentional or not, is important if they are to maintain their psychic balance.

Humor, irony and wit often appear in abundance in those born in this week. These are among the mechanisms by which they are able to survive in an often difficult and hostile world. Another method they may use is the making of silent promises to themselves not to make the same mistake again, or to better their lives through positive action. Making plans and resolutions of all sorts for the future enables them to get through trying times. Above all, they know that no matter how bad things get, tomorrow is another day. In this respect, they view the future as potentially positive and self-renewing.

In the present, on the other hand, Aquarius III's may get into a hopeless state in which they believe that everything has gone wrong. Friends stand by helpless while they complain about their own deficiencies, and about the unfair treatment they receive from the world. If they have negative attitudes about themselves, these can involve feelings of shame that may be focused on their bodies or on mistakes they feel they have made. Such attitudes are empowered by guilt. Yet although Aquarius III's may blame themselves constantly, they can rarely hear reproach from others without a strong defensive reaction, perhaps involving a reciprocal attack on the accuser. Learning to listen to the suggestions of concerned family members may be almost impossible for them; it is easier for them to take advice from friends, or even strangers.

Week of Acceptance people may be extremely affectionate to others and may crave love themselves. Love is apparently hard for them to find, however, since they are constantly in search of it. Aquarius III's are rarely able to find the right person for themselves before the age of thirty, if at all. Their needs often demand a wide range of partners, associates, mates or friends. Aquarius III's are not easily satisfied and often bored. Their need for attention may run high, and the danger here is that they become the eternal butterfly, flitting from one delicious flower to the next. Their nonattachment is not in itself a negative trait—on the contrary, it is a lesson that all of us have to learn sooner or later. For Aquarius III's, however, the lessons that need to be learned are those of constancy, consistency, application and dedication.

Best known for her novel The Color Purple, for which she won the Pulitzer Prize, Alice Walker is also an essayist, poet and short-story writer. The film of the novel by Steven Spielberg brought Alice Walker to even greater public prominence. Born as the youngest child in a rural Georgia sharecropper's family, Walker was blinded in one eye as a child in an accident. Acceptance of her disability and recovering from her troubled adolescence marked her as a true Aquarius III. Working in the civil rights movement in Mississippi, she met and married lawyer Mel Leventhal, with whom she had a daughter, described in her novel Meridian. A more recent novel, The Same River Twice, reveals Alice Walker's struggles toward acceptance.

On the basis of only three films—Rebel Without a Cause, East of Eden and Giant—and his death in a car crash at age 24, actor James Dean attracted a huge cult following. The three films were made in barely over a year, showing Dean as the quintessential rebel and an actor of enormous talent. Both in his life and films, typical Aquarius III problems, such as craving love, being easily bored, protecting the helpless, and having difficulty accepting advice (particularly when given by family members) all emerge strongly. Even Dean's own death at high speed in a sports car was due to his inability to accept limitations of time and space.

Born in Hollywood, the daughter of actress Maureen O'Sullivan and director John Farrow, Mia Farrow was destined for stardom. She made her debut in one of her father's films, John Paul Jones, at age 14. Herself married to (or companion of) three famous men—Frank Sinatra, Andre Previn and Woody Allen—Farrow may have had to accept secondary positions in each relationship. Fittingly, in many of her screen roles she plays vulnerable characters with adaptable egos who learn how to become tough. The elements of her life story include learning to stand up for herself, overcoming insecurities and becoming her own person. Mia Farrow is the biological or adoptive mother of 13 children.

The Cusp of Sensitivity

The Aquarius-Pisces cusp can be symbolically likened in human terms to the period around seventy-seven years of age, and comes amid the freezing, harsh weather of late winter in the northern hemisphere. However, winter will soon be over and spring on the way as the days lengthen.

In human development, at the age of seventy-seven, the close of the life cycle may be near. By this time the human being should have come to terms with his/her life and to peace with loved ones and friends. Breaking down any armor that remains and showing honest feelings are important now. Rarely will new projects be taken on at this time, but the explorations involved in ending life may come to represent a kind of ultimate peak experience for the highly philosophical. The days comprise the Aquarius-Pisces cusp exemplify some of the manifestations of Sensitivity (the central theme of this cusp), where the active, inventive and universal Aquarius impulses merge with watery, impressionable and dreamy Pisces qualities.

Those born on the Cusp of Sensitivity are often success-oriented individuals who give top priority to their career. They are usually fighters, an attitude sometimes based on underlying insecurity and the need to prove themselves. A chip-on-the-shoulder attitude in many Aquarius-Pisces makes them aggressive toward others and belligerent when attacked. A great personal challenge for Aquarius-Pisces, then, is to rediscover and acknowledge their inner makeup and to break down some of the barriers they have built up. The tough, even aggressive exterior of many born on the Aquarius-Pisces Cusp belies the sensitive personality inside. Extremely vulnerable as children, Aquarius-Pisces react to criticism or abuse from others by building a wall around themselves. Carried with them into adulthood, this armor may give the impression of an inner self far different from the reality.

Since Aquarius is the most universal sign and Pisces one of the most intimate, it should not be surprising that many born on this cusp orient themselves to one of two extremes: either the most far-out, idealistic pursuits or the most inner, deep, profound ones. Combining such essentially unlike attitudes may be extremely difficult, and many Aquarius-Pisces swing from one to the other. In their work, for example, they may deal with abstract concerns, or with attempts to surpass objective limitations, while in their private lives they delve into the world of feelings, people and human affairs.

Important as it is for Aquarius-Pisces to reconcile these two extremes in their nature, they should also work to explore the middle ground between them—the social side of life. Being strung between the poles of the physical and the metaphysical often means neglecting interaction with other people.

Aquarius-Pisces may be closely bound to their families. Although parental disapproval and criticism will hurt them in childhood, strong emotional bonds tie them to mother, father, or both. (Usually the stronger and most influential relationship is with the parent of the opposite sex.) Breaking free of such attachments is essential if they are to emerge into adulthood as unique individuals—a truth, perhaps, for many of us, but adolescence may be particularly rebellious and stormy for Aquarius-Pisces. Those who do not succeed in breaking away during this time may continue their struggle for the rest of their lives, even after the death of parents or other powerful family elders.

Particularly in matters of love, Aquarius-Pisces will have to struggle to be open, honest and accepting with their partner, and to allow themselves to be vulnerable, even at the risk of pain. Thus personal relationships may have the effect of putting Aquarius-Pisces back in touch with their essential self. Even Aquarius-Pisces who are forceful and hard-driving in their careers may be quite passive in their personal relationships. In addition, a tendency to display both masculine and feminine qualities in their love relationships, even to the point of bisexuality, can mark male Aquarius-Pisces as unusually sensitive and females as unusually aggressive. Such role reversals often favor their choosing a mate who is their opposite: a more sensitive Aquarius-Pisces male, for example, marrying a more aggressive female, and so on.

In relationships, fear of rejection figures prominently, for Aquarius-Pisces want to be liked but are often afraid of getting hurt, or don't know how to go about getting approval without compromising themselves. For some, a show of pessimism or dissatisfaction guards them against having to interact; others appear more pleasant or agreeable, but this, too, is a facade designed to preclude any deep involvement. Gaining the courage to struggle in their personal relationships as forcefully as in their careers, to risk rejection, stand up for themselves and express their emotions powerfully, are challenges that those born on this cusp must eventually meet.

Friendship may be an important vehicle for bringing Aquarius-Pisces out into the world, enticing them to participate in club, community, philanthropic and school endeavors. The essential role that friends play for those born on this cusp goes beyond normal fellowship, companionship and personal sharing. Beyond having a small number of friends, Aquarius-Pisces gain by building bridges with colleagues, co-workers, acquaintances and more remote family members. By developing their people skills, they will widen their humanity and ease feelings of being isolated and misunderstood. Viewing the suffering of others first-hand can help those born on the Cusp of Sensitivity to realize that the unhappiness they have gone through themselves is in no way unique, allowing them the human points of identification that they desperately need.

Building their own family, including children, or living in a family situation is often a positive experience for Aquarius-Pisces, although their need to be alone and their difficulty in regular or intense interactions may make such relationships hard for them to maintain. Still, their nurturing qualities need to be expressed in some area of their lives—if not through family, perhaps through pets or career projects. Expressing their care, concern and sympathy is as necessary to Aquarius-Pisces as are love and passion.

ADVICE:

Don't give up on the world or retreat behind fences. If necessary tear obstructions down to rediscover your sensitive self. Learning to trust may mean ceasing to fear. Without denying your need to explore the depths and the heights, take the middle road more often.

AQUARIUS - PISCES CUSP NOTABLES

The most beloved of all writers of piano music, Frederic Chopin grew up in Warsaw, the son of a French father and Polish mother. At the astonishingly young age of 18, Chopin had already written the first of his études, nocturnes and piano concertos. Of an incredibly sensitive disposition, Chopin, personifies in his life and music, the qualities of those born on the Aquarius-Pisces cusp. He moved to Paris, where he met novelist George Sand. In their love affair Chopin showed the mixture of masculine and feminine traits and the passivity characteristic of many Aquarius-Pisces people. He made his living teaching piano and gave only a few public concerts, choosing to perform in private salons, occasionally with composer-pianist Franz Liszt.

FREDERIC CHOPIN

Born on the Cusp of Sensitivity, novelist and college professor Toni Morrison shows the unusually close family bonds in childhood and the orientation toward success that are characteristic of many an Aquarius-Pisces. Winner of the Pulitzer Prize and the Nobel Prize for Literature, the first African American to win the latter, she is author of the novels The Bluest Eye, Sula, Song of Solomon, Tar Baby, Beloved and Jazz. Morrison has also had a distinguished teaching career, beginning at Texas Southern and Howard universities and more recently at Harvard and Yale and as Robert F. Goheen Professor of Humanities at Princeton. Morrison worked in the publishing business as a senior editor at Random House.

In a sport where superstars abound, guard Michael Jordan has been called the greatest basketball player of all time. Jordan's extreme Sensitivity is well hidden behind a wall of self-assurance, characteristic of many born on the Aquarius-Pisces cusp. The public got a quick glimpse of his more personal feelings when Michael's father died. On the court, Jordan is unstoppable. His stats are overwhelming: 8-time All-NBA First Team, 8-time scoring leader, 10-time All-Star, 4-time MVP, as well as the highest scoring average in history, an amazing 32 points per game. In tv interviews, the impeccably dressed Jordan conveys a strong and articulate image but holds a lot of emotion quietly in reserve.

PISCES I
The Week of Spirit

February 23–March 2

The Pisces I period takes Spirit as its central image. This segment of the The Grand Cycle of Life can be likened in human terms to the years of a person's late seventies. At this time, in the twilight of life, many think of higher values and of spiritual goals. For some, religion plays an important role at this time, for others a cause that embodies their highest ideals. Realizing that they have already lived beyond the average lifespan gives many a feeling for the precious nature of life that they never had previously. Ideally, every week, month and year—ultimately, every day—becomes a special gift. However, others may have come to regard life as a burden and long for the release of the spirit from the body.

The days that comprise Pisces I symbolically reveal the elder embracing the present moment fully, either with joy or sorrow, but also pausing to contemplate the past and future more meaningfully than before. A higher consciousness of the meaning of life, sacrifice for a higher cause, belief in the afterlife or reincarnation, even a continued zest for living and a wish to remain ever young, are all possible at this time.

Those born in the Week of Spirit value the nonmaterial side of life. It's not that they lack either respect for money-making and business or abilities in these fields. It is simply that, whether engaged in the arts or in finance, in religion or in administration, Pisces I's generally approach their work devotionally, elevating it to an idealistic plane. Nor are they without strong physical drives, or a love of the pleasures of the table and the bed. A blend of a spiritual and a sensual approach is at the heart of their personalities. Many Pisces I's do not see spirituality as denoting an ascetic approach that would ask them to cut their bonds with the everyday world. On the contrary, since those born in this week seek the spirit in everything around them, they rarely feel the need to reject worldly considerations.

Spiritedness is also characteristic of Pisces I's, who are often lively and entertaining people. They have a youthful air that can belie their actual age. Not infrequently, those born in this week are also engaged in the personal pursuit of health or are advocates of it. It is important to them to lead a healthy life, so as to increase not only the longevity but the quality of their earthly existence. A desire to do good, in the sense of leaving one's immediate environment, or the world in general, a bit of a better place at the close of a career or a life, is characteristic of those born in the Week of Spirit. Watching environmental mistakes or catastrophes happen, then, may be particularly difficult for these involved, caring individuals.

The devotional and service-oriented side of Pisces I's urges them to give up their own wants, making them subservient to their need to give pleasure and benefit to others. As a consequence of this quality, they may easily become the target or prey of more selfish individuals, who see them as an easy touch, and a dependable source of sympathy, energy or money. Making big-hearted offers to others, and then coming to regret or resent these promises, may lead Pisces I's into arguments and emotional crises. Indeed, sending mixed signals is characteristic of those born in this week.

Pisces I's are prone to feeling hurt when others do not meet their high standards of friendship. In fact, they put such high expectations on their relationships that they set themselves up for unhappiness. They have an intense emotionality that is often difficult for them to control, and that gets them in trouble with others who see things in a more detached or objective way. Those born in this week are transparent, wearing their hearts on their sleeves. They are not particularly good at hiding their feelings, particularly disappointment. In one relationship after another, they can refuse to learn how to protect themselves, or to keep their egos from merging with their love object, no matter how much they swear to do so.

For all their humanitarian and empathic qualities, Pisces I's may tend to imagine themselves on a higher plane than those around them, often without realizing it. This unconscious attitude may keep them from a deeper involvement with others, leading to a somewhat superficial involvement with life, or, worse, to negativity and bitter cynicism toward the world.

The know-it-all attitude of some Pisces I's is difficult for others to deal with, and can lead to resentment and ultimately rejection in personal relationships. By admitting mistakes, and above all by being open to suggestions and criticism, the philosophical individuals born in this week will rise to an even higher personal level in their search for meaning in life.

Sharing at a deep level with family and friends is an essential need for Pisces I's—the knack for enjoying the pleasures of life alone is not usually part of their makeup. Unfortunately they are not always successful in their attempts to share, and this can be a source of continued frustration throughout their lives. In their love relationships Pisces I's often display an emotional instability. Changing partners can become a way of life for them. In fact, what they are really seeking is an ideal, and if they find it they will not hesitate to commit to it in a permanent relationship.

One of the biggest problems in their treatment of mates or spouses is backing off emotionally, though they remain loyal and devoted. In turn, they may make demands that others find suffocating; Pisces I's can be a lot to handle. And no matter how much they insist on their belief in mutual independence, or in an “open” marriage or relationship, they can be quite unrealistic in not recognizing their own possessive and jealous nature.

Rather than living in a world of expectations, concepts and ideas most of the time, Pisces I's would do well to accept the responsibility of simple everyday tasks and chores that will ground them in the here and now. The stability of their relationships will be enhanced if their mates and friends insist that they take on firm responsibilities, even performing mundane, repetitive tasks which are difficult to idealize. Partners who fail in this, perhaps just refusing to rely on the Pisces I and doing what needs to be done themselves, will simply reinforce their mate's bad habits: those born in this week are regretfully prone to walking forgetfully out of the kitchen before the dishes are collected and washed.

ADVICE:

Sometimes you need to be more aggressive. Keep in touch with everyday matters and remain attentive to your needs and the needs of others. Beware of alienation through placing yourself on a higher plane. Seeking a higher state of consciousness need not mean avoiding shouldering the work of life.

PISCES I NOTABLES

Typical of those born in the Week of Spirit, film star Elizabeth Taylor has made many changes in her search for an ideal in love and has had difficulties protecting herself from her own feelings. In fact, Taylor has been married 8 times, including twice to actor Richard Burton, opposite whom she won an Oscar for Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? Like many Pisces I's, Taylor blends high-spiritedness with intense physicality, traits that are evident both on and off the screen. She has been tireless in her work for the American Foundation for AIDS Research, of which she was the founding chairperson. Her struggle with alcohol and painkiller dependency typical of Pisceans, has been widely publicized.

Embodying many traits of those born in the Week of Spirit, 2-time Nobel Prize-winning scientist Linus Pauling dedicated his life to making others more healthy and happy (he won a Nobel Prize for chemistry, and the Peace Prize). He was the leading authority on the use of vitamin C, which he urged most people to take at very high doses, usually up to several grams per day. Pauling refuted all reports of ill effects of megadoses of vitamin C and claimed its positive benefit in combating a host of illnesses and building resistance against disease, notably the common cold.

LINUS PAULING

Founder of the Linus Pauling Institute of Science and Medicine in Palo Alto, Calif., he continued to be extremely active (and controversial) into his late 80s, which he attributed to a healthy lifestyle.

Political philosopher and the last Soviet president, Mikhail Gorbachev did more than any single figure to bring about the breakup of the Soviet Union and the emergence of democracy in Russia. He was notably the innovator of two major ideological concepts in his country: perestroika (restructuring) and glasnost (openness). Gorbachev was the only official in Soviet history to win the Nobel Peace Prize. In many ways a typical Pisces I, Gorbachev approached his work in a devotional manner and elevated his activities to an idealistic plane. Although extremely unpopular in the former Soviet Union today and blamed for the current economic woes there, Gorbachev is highly regarded internationally.

The Week of the Loner

The Pisces II period takes The Loner as its central image. According to The Grand Cycle of Life, in human terms this period relates to the time when a person reaches the majestic age of eighty. At this point, feelings of oneness with the nature of things but isolation from the world of man may arise. Many friends and perhaps a life partner have departed, leaving the octogenarian to carry on. This can be an extremely trying time both psychologically and physically—thus keeping positive about life may be difficult. Some now yearn for an easy end, but others may enjoy a final release from the responsibilities of this world and thus experience a sense of renewed freedom.

The days comprise Pisces II symbolically reveal a person very advanced in years turning inward and pursuing purely internal goals in relative isolation. Thinking creatively and imaginatively, contemplating rewards or punishments in the afterlife and apprehending a heightened sense of beauty in the nature of things are all typical of this period.

Pisces II's tend to live in a private world of their own. This is true not only internally but outwardly for their homes are often retreats from the world, places to which few are admitted. The healthier Pisces II's can give equal weight to their careers, on the one hand, and to their social and personal lives, on the other; less balanced individuals born in this week may choose to isolate themselves more than is good for them.

Pisces II's generally have an instinctive dislike of superficiality. They mistrust loud, aggressive or pushy individuals and find it hard to work with colleagues who lack sensitivity. This is not to imply that they lack force or ambition. For them, however, the way a thing is done is often more important than what that thing is; and the end therefore rarely justifies the means. Grace, honesty and an unassailable aesthetic and moral code prevent them from acting underhandedly or, in particular, hurtfully. On the other hand, Pisces II's may express their dislike of society's mores through blatantly antisocial deeds, acting, as it were, in defense of their own right to individual expression. A certain elegance and grace are evident in most things they do, and they are finely attuned to many kinds of physical expression, whether it be sports, dance or more sensual forms of movement. Those born in this week are great admirers of sensuous beauty, particularly in people and paintings, and their homes and surroundings generally show some kind of special touch.

Pisces II's have a strong soulful side, apparent in their love of music and in their empathy for all forms of human suffering. They generally believe that life is not just there to be enjoyed, and that one must in some way pay one's dues with a certain amount of suffering before obtaining any real benefit. Rarely will those born in this week escape at least one severe trauma in their lives, perhaps involving physical injury, disease or the untimely death of a parent or friend. They are often struck by such catastrophes without warning, but they are resilient and have an enormous capacity to bounce back from disaster. Like a cat, they are blessed with nine lives, at least a few of which they are sure to use up.

Pisces II's see a distinct difference between being lonely (which they rarely are) and being alone (which they are often). Their own best companion, they are capable of spending hours and days alone with a good book, or with their work, without needing to talk to anyone. Their friends will know when they want to be left alone and when they want company, and will learn not to intrude on their privacy. In the workplace they do well as freelancers, operating outside the office, but if employed by a company or business they will probably need a certain amount of time each day for working on their own.

Dangerous areas for the Pisces II personality include anything with a strong habitative or outright addictive quality—drugs, drink, sex. On the other hand, their ecstatic highs, spiritual insights and emotional joys can be incredibly intense and rewarding. Pisces II's often crave peak experiences, which are not bad things in themselves as long as those who seek them can handle them without undue attachment. If the Pisces II's remain free to move on, such experiences will leave them greatly enriched in their personal development. On the other hand, should they be unfortunate enough to get hooked on their own personal suffering or self-pity, they may wallow in such states for alarmingly long periods of time.

Generally speaking, Pisces II's ask only one thing from the world, and that is to be accepted as they really are. That the world often cannot grant their wish becomes the cross they bear. To comfort themselves, and to shield themselves from disappointment and rejection, they may surrender to the pursuit of money, or retreat to a fantasy-full interior life, often devoted to beauty and imagination. Whenever possible, Pisces II's should follow occupations that make solid and grounding demands on them without depriving them of creativity. This kind of work will help them to stay on an even keel.

Those born in the Week of the Loner usually have few friends, but those they have are often close and loyal. Many born in this week do not like large family gatherings or social events; intimacy is really their thing, and sharing intimacy with others, whether mates, friends, lovers or valued family members, is perhaps their most cherished activity. Highly personal interaction is their forte, and the sharing of joys and sorrows is essential to their happiness.

In love, perhaps because those born in this week have a greater ability to enjoy or appreciate such areas than others do, or perhaps their resistance to the lure of physical pleasure is lower; they are more prone than others to be snagged by a pretty face, sensuous voice or alluring body. Once attached to a person, their addiction to his or her company can be even more severe than their attraction to physical substances. They will run the gamut of painful emotions, from jealousy to hatred, yet if they decide they want to get free of their love object they will feel powerful separation anxiety. Friends and mates of a practical nature tend to bring them down to earth. Meanwhile, children will help them share their sense of wonder and awe at the natural world.

ADVICE:

Try to remain realistic in your outlook. Resist the lure of escapes, in all their varied forms. On the other hand, leave a window open on the world. Continue to strive for trust and acceptance, but remember to stand up for yourself as well. Improving your social position may make certain things easier for you. Your suffering may neither be unique or, for that matter, necessary.

PISCES II NOTABLES

TAMARA KARSAVINA

The name of Tamara Karsavina is not as well known in America as that of Pavlova and Nijinsky, but these three were undoubtedly the leading Russian ballet dancers of their time. She was a highly private Pisces II who lived very much in a world of her own. Nijinsky's partner, and his equal in classical technique, she lost him when he was hospitalized with schizophrenia at age 28. Diaghilev's prima ballerina at the Ballet Russe in Paris, Karsavina danced Stravinsky's ballet Petrouchka with Michel Fokine and also danced with Russian dancer-choreographer Léonide Massine. Karsavina was co-founder of the Royal Academy of Dancing in London and was known as a kind and understanding, albeit eccentric, teacher.

Although Bobby Fischer emerged as the world champion of chess after his historic match with Boris Spassky, he retreated in true Pisces II fashion and has made only one major public chess appearance since: in Montenegro in 1991 when he faced Spassky again. Very much a Loner, Fischer felt rejected by the chess world, particularly the Russians, whom he saw as a malignant influence on the game. Fischer proved himself not only an amazingly aggressive player but also a highly canny one who did not hesitate to use psychology against Spassky to undermine his confidence. To suggest that Fischer lost the 1st game to Spassky on purpose and deliberately forfeited the 2nd by not showing up seems inconceivable, but he may in fact have put himself at a 2-0 disadvantage intentionally to set his opponent up for his devastatingly destructive comeback.

Italian film actress Anna Magnani had the soulful, inner quality of a Pisces II woman. Her first early performance to gain international acclaim was in Roberto Rossellini's neorealist film Open City. Although Magnani worked mostly in Italian cinema, she became known to the American public in 1955, when she made The Rose Tattoo with Burt Lancaster, for which she received an Oscar for best actress. Magnani had an earthy sexiness, but her unusual looks did not destine her to be a glamour queen. She did best in more serious and maternal roles. Thus Magnani impressed her audiences as an actress with deep feelings, characteristic of those born in the Week of the Loner.

PISCES III

The Week of Dancers and Dreamers

March 11–18

The Pisces III period takes Dancers and Dreamers as its central image. Simply put, this period closes the Grand Cycle and represents the ending of this lifetime on earth. The great wheel has at last come full circle. Those about to leave this earthly plane feel the gravity of the earth's attraction more strongly than ever but also the inexorable pull of the world beyond. Even through pain and suffering, a range of emotions may be felt: from acceptance to expectation to excitement joy. A quickening sense of an experience far beyond what one has yet known or, in some cases, a glimmering recognition of such a state may be felt at this time. Both present and past are finally left behind in the body when the mind enters a dreamworld and the soul dances on. The days that comprise Pisces III symbolically reveal an individual embarking on the ultimate transition into the beyond. Exercising faculties of intuition and inspiration, encountering an inexorable fate (embracing it or struggling against it), rising to new spiritual heights and realizations and, finally, closing the life cycle that may lead again to rebirth are all part of this process.

Strongly philosophical, Pisces III's often spend time contemplating the intricacies of human thought and the wonders of the universe. Their minds roam freely over areas that many would find daunting or at least mysterious. They start wondering about the meaning of life early on, and often continue to puzzle over such questions for a lifetime—indeed, these issues can become the driving force behind their careers and lifestyles.

Although visionary in thought, Pisces III's have an intensely practical side and often well-developed technical or scientific skills. It is important to them to take an active hand in whatever is going on around them and to help other people solve their problems; they have a tremendous need to influence the lives of others and often manage to do so. Pisces III's may even become overinvolved, failing to recognize when to back off. Those around them may come to view their interest as meddling, mistrusting or resenting their good intentions.

One might accuse Pisces III's of being unrealistic if they didn't prove correct so much of the time. Making the unbelievable believable, or the impossible possible, is perhaps their greatest power. They may seem to be quite down-to-earth, pragmatic, even ordinary types, yet their achievements at times border on the miraculous. It is as if, although not actually believers in miracles, they were somehow able to realize or experience them. There is a marked tendency to the paranormal in the personalities of those born in the Week of Dancers and Dreamers, who can manifest clairvoyant or telepathic tendencies at an early age. If those around them downplay, scoff at or suppress their abilities, they may not feel secure enough to acknowledge and reveal these talents openly until later in life.

Pisces III's must beware of appearing too glib and learn when to speak on a given subject. Although much that they say is true, and of a high order of thinking, their omniscient manner can antagonize people. Developing humility and admitting mistakes will only add to their credibility—an important lesson, since they can become highly frustrated if their words fail to have the desired effect. They often see themselves as teachers, a role they aren't necessarily at all cut out for, and their disappointment over not having students, followers or disciples can bring them a measure of unhappiness.

Those around Pisces III's may well find them strange or peculiar, a trait that can make them either more or less desirable, depending on whom they meet. Some Pisces III's have an air of self-importance, others radiate a kind of ineffectuality; both types may become complacent, however, figuring that wherever they are at that moment, whether in their career or in their living situation, is the best or at least the safest place for them to be. To an unusual degree, however, their lives are ruled by fate, and at a certain point, perhaps between the ages of twenty-eight and forty-two, a call will come to them in the form of a great challenge. Whether they respond to this unsolicited invitation from destiny may well determine the course of the rest of their lives. If they try to scale the heights, they have a better-than-average chance of succeeding, no matter how daunting the endeavor.

Comfort-loving, those born in this week know how to make life pleasant for themselves and for others; in furnishing their homes, for example, they are often tasteful and imaginative. Yet a curious wanderlust or impermanence in their lifestyles can make for frequent moves, in which they leave a string of well-furnished and improved dwellings behind them. Those who do manage to stay in one place for a time may periodically need to refurbish or renovate their living space, whether those who share it with them believe this to be necessary or not.

Although Pisces III's usually seem very independent, they often foster dependencies in others. They need to feel that they count, that they matter. This need to be needed may be one of their most vulnerable points: if their children, parents, colleagues or lovers assert a degree of independence, or cease to rely on them, they can fall apart. A family, whether biological or metaphorical, is usually essential for Pisces III's, and the degree of responsibility they assume in it may be quite impressive.

Those born in the Week of Dancers and Dreamers are finely attuned to the wants of others. Often highly empathic, they are good listeners and are quite able to relate to and make sense of other people's points of view. Pisces III's know well that the world is made up of many subjective viewpoints, each true for its author, and perhaps actually true also, in a relative sense. At the same time, however, Pisces III's tend to feel that behind these differing viewpoints stands an absolute that is not dependent on subjectivity at all but is objectively true in all situations and for all time. Thus the underlying philosophy of these individuals is a curious blend of subjectivity and objectivity, the relative and the absolute, the believer and the skeptic.

Pisces III's can be unstable and unrealistic in their romantic relationships and often get involved with the wrong partner. Yet if they make the commitment to a love that is positive and nurturing, they are quite capable of making loyal and devoted spouses.

PISCES III NOTABLES

Born in Montgomery, Ala., Nat King Cole was the youngest son of a Baptist minister and sang solos in church as a child. When his three older brothers went into the music business, Nat followed them. In 1939 he formed his own jazz trio and was known for years as an influential jazz pianist. But like many Pisces III's, Cole was destined to follow his dreams, which in this case meant becoming a great pop singer. Astonishingly successful at his new profession, Cole wound up selling over 50 million records. His mellow voice and relaxed singing style captivated audiences around the world.

Later in life he became the first African American to have his own tv show and had a role in the film Cat Ballou shortly before his death.

Actress, dancer, singer Liza Minnelli made her debut in film at age 2 playing opposite her mother, Judy Garland, in the film In the Good Old Summertime. Her father, Pisces Vincente Minnelli, was a director of Broadway musicals and Hollywood films. No wonder with such a background that Dancer and Dreamer Minnelli should have become a Broadway and Hollywood star with an Oscar for the film Cabaret and numerous other awards. Like many born in her week, Minnelli, has experienced disappointment in one with a number of failed relationships.

LIZA MINNELLI

It is hard to imagine that Albert Einstein, perhaps the greatest mind of the 20th century, was a late talker, did poorly in school, failed his college entrance exam and finally managed to land a job in the Swiss Patent Office. Fortunately, he had some time on his hands and was able to earn a doctorate from the University of Zurich before proceeding to revolutionize the study of physics with his startling theories. Einstein was a typical Pisces III who needed time to dream and would not be hurried in his thinking. In 1915 he published his General Theory of Relativity, which led to instant recognition and fame. His second great task was to unify the many physical forces under one theory, but he never succeeded in doing so.

The Soulful Flame

This relationship is paradoxical: straightforward, simple, yet emotionally profound and complex. Each of these cosmic twins, both born on the Cusp of Rebirth, melds fire and water, an interaction generating a lot of steam—and symbolizing the tremendous pressure that simultaneously binds the relationship and threatens to burst it apart. The relationship is marked by an ethereal kind of passion, sometimes amorphous and other times flaming out of control. These qualities make it hard to define or grasp—except for each partner, who understands the coupling on a deep, almost subconscious level.

The relationship's primal nature is emphasized by its direct expression of emotions, usually of the black-and-white variety: love or hate, not affection; like or dislike, not sympathy; sex or abstinence, not sensuousness. Similarities and differences, attractions and repulsions—all avoid the gray, in-between areas. Fights between these two are intense, but periods of ease may be marked by remarkable camaraderie and good feeling. Both Pisces-Aries partners are at times bewildered by what is happening between them and at a loss to control it; like the weather, their relationship is truly elemental.

This combination is not recommended for stable love or marital relationships, but two Pisces-Aries can make good friends. They won't necessarily be close, however; there will always be a competitive element between them, no matter how deep their bond of understanding. Constant confrontation and criticism do not bode well for a day-to-day relationship but perhaps allow for one in which they see each other less often. Sexual encounters between individuals born on this cusp are likely to be brief and intense.

The directness of this relationship can also lead to mutual respect and, from there, to an unspoken decision not to compete or battle at all. It is possible for two such individuals to work cooperatively in the same company or even side by side, as long as the nature of their tasks, and the position they occupy in the group, are well defined and, ideally, do not overlap. Should they happen to be on the same side, their dynamism can sweep the field.

ADVICE: Let up a bit in your intensity. Rethink your extreme position. Try to find a middle ground, even when it seems amorphous.

Passionate Innocence

The search for lost innocence that often plays a part in this relationship involves an impossible goal, true, yet also an ideal to strive for, in ways that may have a real effect on behavior. The unreachable image of perfect beauty that suffuses this bond gives its partners an air sometimes of detachment, if the ideal is not in sight, sometimes of intense involvement, if perfection appears at hand. The result is a relationship that features a kind of childlike wonder—or, on the other side of the coin, simple childishness. Whether objective, effective and conscious or subjective, diffuse and unaware, it is a relationship that puts myriad moods and feelings into play, calling up a broad spectrum of emotions from its partners. An ideal of perfection now seems attainable, now can only be hoped for; when it is not achieved, the partners may pick and snipe at each other.

Passionate love is possible between Pisces-Aries and Aries I's, with the former often assuming the active role, the latter the passive one. Aries I's frequently need to be involved with unconventional people in unusual relationships, and Pisces-Aries may fit the bill. Problems arise when Pisces-Aries prove too dominant and controlling, preventing Aries I's from feeling able to be themselves or what they need to be. On the other hand, Aries I's may not be dependable or trustworthy enough for Pisces-Aries, who may at first be charmed by their partner's childlike innocence but eventually find it threatening, or just a bit much to deal with.

Friendships and love relationships between these two can be very close but may also feature a lot of squabbling, bickering and temporary estrangements. When both parties act immaturely, there may be too little stability in the relationship to hold it together.

The relationship brings positive energy to the initiation of new endeavors. In the long run, however, and in day-to-day tasks of maintenance, its energy may flag and the partners' interests wane. What often signals the beginning of the end is a marked drop in enthusiasm on both sides. If the partnership is to survive, it will seek to move on to a new endeavor, perhaps one that grows organically out of a past success.

ADVICE: Recognize the dark side, too. Don't smooth over pain and loss. Finish one project before going on to another. Work hard at maintenance.

The Seething Cauldron

Youthful energies vie for the ascendancy here; highly competitive, this relationship often resembles an all-out, no-holds-barred melee. The motivating factors, however, are rarely real hatred or destructive, violent feelings but, rather, jealousy and a desire to better or overcome. This makes the relationship a little easier, but not a lot. Contentious, it demands the very best that its partners have to offer and also asks that they perform at a high degree of excellence. Both will feel the strain but will also welcome the challenge. Attitudes will be honest and frank, leaving little doubt about where real feelings lie.

The emotionally complex Pisces-Aries craves understanding in this relationship, which may be precisely what Aries II is unable to give. Aries II's, for their part, probably won't appreciate Pisces-Aries' sharp outspokenness; sensitive to criticism, they need to be accepted unconditionally as they are. In addition, Pisces-Aries are very independent—probably too independent to satisfy the Aries II need to be needed. More likely, they will only deliver frustration, and to the wrong address.

Mutual respect in this relationship may only be possible after the dust has settled from a series of battles, perhaps over power or money, in which both participants have emerged somewhat the worse for wear. No matter where the relationship emerges—in work, love, friendship or family—and no matter how old its partners, it most resembles two youthful siblings slugging it out. Such fights can go on for years, and although mutual understanding may not readily emerge, both partners will undoubtedly benefit from the relationship's lessons in ego toughening and self-defense. There is really no reason why this combative stance cannot be softened over time, however, in favor of a negotiated armistice. Acceptance may well prove the key.

ADVICE: Seek the calm in the eye of the hurricane. The hard way isn't always best. Your enemy may be a friend in disguise.

Comic Relief

Laughter is used to lighten oppressive moods in this relationship. From slapstick to wordplay, from gentle cajoling to dark humor, comedy in many forms serves to clear the air and provides a common basis for communication. The sharpness of mind found in this relationship needs a reliable safety valve, and joking, whether sarcastic and ironic or more friendly, is usually effective.

Both partners are usually well served by the relationship and, in general, satisfied by it. The connection is often teacher-student or parent-child, with the Aries III adopting the more mature role. Fortunately, Aries III usually has the understanding and patience necessary to deal with Pisces-Aries complexity. When in torment, Pisces-Aries tend to lash out, but they will find Aries III's less reactive than most, more willing to listen and ready to communicate by poking fun. Aries III's are often limited in their capacity to give full-hearted sympathy, however, and in this respect Pisces-Aries needs may remain unsatisfied.

Whether romantic or platonic, the interaction between these two personalities is often physically oriented. They may be well suited for a sexual relationship, or for sharing sport, training or fitness programs, perhaps on the same team, or as opposing partners. Maintaining a healthy and attractive physical appearance is extremely, perhaps overly, important here. Competitiveness is unlikely to get out of hand and can yield positive results in gradually bettering each person's performance. This relationship is also strong in the mental sphere, where these two personalities may constantly be at work sharpening their wits on each other.

As co-workers and business partners, Pisces-Aries and Aries III's can work very well together, sharing tasks and supporting each other's efforts. As husband and wife, they can sustain both love and friendship over the long haul, as long as they both practice flexibility and tolerance.

Star Wars

Power struggles may endanger, or at the very least seriously disturb, all projects undertaken in this relationship, as well as the well-being of anyone in its vicinity. The wheelhouse of this ship is too small to admit two captains; when both partners vie for the helm, the relationship is likely to go adrift or wind up on the rocks. If this duo is to succeed, the issue of who is boss will have to be settled, since competition for the star position will disrupt all other efforts. If power struggles can be kept at bay, however, the relationship will display a generosity to others that will win over many of those around it.

Synergistically yoked and pulling in the same direction, the strengths of Pisces-Aries and Aries-Taurus can be irresistible. This augurs well for business partnerships and joint operations with well-defined goals and adequate working capital. Generally speaking, however, speculative ventures between these two should be avoided in favor of projects in which the imaginative strengths of the Pisces-Aries and the conceptual power of the Aries-Taurus can be joined in a well-grounded, straightforward and no-nonsense way.

Since largesse is characteristic of this relationship in any sphere, serious financial problems can arise: carelessness with money and buying too much on credit are problems here. In the long run, the Aries-Taurus is much too realistic to meet the Pisces-Aries need for acceptance and sympathy. The rather thin-skinned Pisces-Aries, meanwhile, will often find the helpful suggestions and prodding of the Aries-Taurus intolerable.

A star war may rage over who is to be the center of attention. If so, Aries-Taurus are a lot tougher than Pisces-Aries. Likewise, should the relationship be plagued by problems, and especially problems of insensitivity or neglect, Aries-Taurus will hang in there and try to work things out, while Pisces-Aries tend to feel hurt and to flee. Ultimately no one will be the winner in battles for recognition, however, and the sooner these two make peace and fight on the same side, the more successful the relationship will be.

ADVICE: Pay more attention to each other. Keep your sunny side up. Share adventuresome experiences. Try to be less needy of praise.

Good-Tasting Medicine

A healthy relationship in this combination does not involve deep bonding or emotional soul-searching but shared pleasures. Although it may lack a deep emotional tie, it has the virtue of being self-correcting: should the contrasting needs of its partners put it out of kilter, it will usually revert to a balanced state and be put right by a good, healthy dose of sensuous enjoyment. Thus the relationship can be likened to a physician who can cure people's ills simply by paying attention to them.

Here the voluptuous qualities of the Taurus I complement the subtle hedonism of the Pisces-Aries. The enjoyments of this matchup are more effective in casual relationships, however, than in those that demand a deeper commitment: being married or living together, for example, may prove problematic. Taurus I's are hard workers who need a quiet home environment, and Pisces-Aries are often too nervous and emotional to give them rest. Furthermore, Pisces-Aries may grow bored with the stolid approach of Taurus I's and may tend to roam, failing to live up to domestic responsibilities. Perhaps the relationship's main problem is that Pisces-Aries seek a deeper level of emotional involvement than Taurus I's are prepared or able to give.

In the family, a Taurus I parent may be unwilling to spend the necessary time trying to unravel the intricacies and subtleties of the Pisces-Aries child. Friendships between these two may not exhibit deep bonding if Taurus I's repress feelings and are unable to share emotionally. In general, the health of the relationship may suffer from conflicts in which Taurus I's are interested in results and Pisces-Aries in the motives behind people's actions, with blame and stricture being the results. A curative approach based on activities of pleasure and fun (food, travel, theatrical or musical performances, TV, a hobby or just plain doing nothing) may help the relationship to last, even if true passion has faded or was never there.

ADVICE: Don't go too deep. Attend to bad feelings immediately. Concentrate on health. Social activities should be stressed. Remember that life is theater.

Magical Mist

Mutual fascination, and a drive toward the unusual, strange, bizarre and theatrical sides of life, lie at the base of this relationship. Little time is given to introspection and thought. Always moving ahead with an eye on the attractive object, the relationship isn't able to see the path clearly; a haze of unreality gets in the way. A strong magnetic attraction may cause close bonds to form rather quickly, but these feelings can later evaporate just as fast. When danger signals begin to flash, the absence of established roots (since the relationship has developed too hurriedly) may seriously undermine any stability that has been attained.

Pisces-Aries and Taurus II can form a mutual-admiration society that leads them quite quickly into a love affair or marriage. The problem is that they may completely overlook their differences in the heat of the initial involvement, particularly if they share a strong physical attraction. Much later, when things begin to cool down, there will be stress. As time wears on, once-small irritations may develop into major antipathies. In the spheres of love and marriage, strong emotions may have been voiced; when these give way to the first expressions of dissatisfaction, major seismic waves will run through the relationship. Not naturally domineering, Taurus II's can't accept their partners as they are and will encourage them to be themselves. Yet a Pisces-Aries is likely only to feel hurt by a Taurus II's first expression of what is intended as constructive criticism. This will bewilder the Taurus II, who was only trying to help.

The relationship may ultimately have to be restructured. If they back off in emotional areas and keep their contacts as objective as possible, partners can perhaps stay friends or, if they are co-workers, continue to collaborate on a common project. Feelings may deepen over the years if given time to develop a strong common basis. Pisces-Aries and Taurus II's are often able to help each other careerwise, since appreciation of each other's talents and enthusiasm is characteristic of this matchup.

ADVICE: One step at a time. Excitement is stimulating, but its results are not always beneficial. Keep your vision focused. Criticism can be helpful.

Water Under the Bridge

This relationship is based on a spontaneous, honest and direct approach to experience. It reveals a lot of awe and wonder in respect to creation and the cosmos, since it synthesizes and elevates the child-like innocence of the Pisces-Aries and the love of nature and instinctual expression of the Taurus III. It is also characterized by unusual lifestyles and a shared interest in bizarre subjects. Behavior tending to the eccentric or outrageous can appear here and is not always conducive to stability.

Particularly in the realms of friendship, love and marriage, the relationship develops slowly. Pisces-Aries and Taurus III characteristically take little notice of each other at first; then one day they find themselves either strongly attracted or repelled, for no obvious reason. In fact, they have a bond of commonalty, but this will only become apparent after a lot of water has gone under the bridge.

The relationship, then, does not usually manifest as love at first sight. Initially, in fact, mutual dislike is more often the case. This allows each person an objective assessment of the other's strengths and weaknesses early on, an objectivity that may well prove a solid basis for further involvement; should the relationship continue, it will be characterized by realistic, down-to-earth attitudes curiously at variance with its often somewhat wild interests and behavior. Love and marriage are more common in this relationship than friendship, for the extremes of emotion aroused by friendship may have a strong physical side, which, whether positive or negative, may preclude the more controlled and straightforward attitudes one usually has toward friends and acquaintances. If this matchup manifests in the family sphere, especially when Pisces-Aries and Taurus III's are siblings, opposition to a judgmental parent or other oppressive family member may further unify this bond into a nurturing, caring and well-nigh unassailable entity.

ADVICE: Tone down your outrageousness a bit—don't shove it in everyone's face. Accept normal behavior. Cultivate objectivity in all areas of life.

Power Play

A desire to work together lies at the forefront of this relationship, but underlying power plays create a curious difficulty in doing so. Open conflict is generally absent; instead, there is wariness and playful competition. As in the martial arts, no one lets down his or her guard, but such defensive postures prevent real intimacy. Also precluding openness, unconditional giving and sharing are ego and pride, which play strong roles here. Trust will have to be built up over many months and years; it cannot be expected to come easily. The realization that kindness, acceptance and love have their own kind of strength, which can only be tapped by relinquishing power games, must be a goal to strive for.

Pisces-Aries and Taurus-Gemini rarely get to feel completely comfortable with each other. Mutual respect is fought back at first; only later will appreciation of each other's talents and abilities emerge. Elemental differences prevail at the outset (Pisces-Aries combining water and fire, Taurus-Gemini earth and air), but as the relationship develops, fire and earth, symbolizing intuition and sensation, generally become dominant. If power games are put aside, then, the relationship may flourish in the area of physical activity, whether sports, sex or adventure. Business, too, can prosper.

At the start, Pisces-Aries are usually more attracted to Taurus-Gemini, with their flair and energy, than the other way around; at first, in fact, the emotional complexity of Pisces-Aries may even be a little daunting to Taurus-Gemini. Eventually, however, it proves too fascinating to resist. At this point the pendulum swings in the opposite direction and Taurus-Gemini may come on too strong, offending the sensibilities of Pisces-Aries or scaring them off. Given this to-and-fro tension, the relationship often finds its greatest success in the workplace, where these two may be forced to spend time together and get to know each other. Only after they are on the same wavelength will love and marital relations become possible.

ADVICE: Rely more on your intuition. Use power to achieve mutual goals. Tune in to the power of love. To succeed, you must sometimes risk getting hurt.

Head-On Collision

This relationship will be strongly involved in the material world. Pisces-Aries is a water-fire mixture and Gemini I an air sign, so the relationship yokes these two together through earth, symbolizing not only sensuousness but also practicality, pragmatic attitudes and an appetite for both work and a materialistic approach to life. A mental orientation, symbolized by the exchange of ideas, usually predominates at the relationship's start, and in career and friendship there is often also a shared interest in technical matters. Self-understanding is not characteristic of this relationship, so energy is often wasted as the duo impulsively heads off in the wrong direction, particularly when things are going well. Only when breakdown or crisis forces a reorganization, whether of routines and habits or on the physical plane, will understanding and sensitivity have a chance to emerge. Unless both parties understand the relationship's practical nature (a difficult task at best for these two), no forward progress or development will be possible.

That Gemini I's have neither the time nor the interest to satisfy the Pisces-Aries need to be understood causes frustration in their partners in this combination, particularly in love affairs and marriages. But Gemini I's do have the mental objectivity that Pisces-Aries lack and can therefore be a great help to them, advising or guiding them in fiscal matters or planning their careers. Furthermore, hardheaded Gemini I's are difficult to convince, and if an imaginative Pisces-Aries needs to bounce an idea off someone, they can be crucial sounding-boards.

Both parties are extremely quick in grasping ideas and concepts, which augurs well for open channels of communication between them in the family. Gemini I's show particular fluency in dealing with technical matters or with issues of physical motion, and this can fascinate Pisces-Aries, who may seek to join in with such activities. They may also be satisfied to be appreciative bystanders, but if they do participate in Gemini I's interests, a common project may prove to be the physical manifestation that this matchup requires.

ADVICE: Get the best out of the present before moving on to the future. Consolidate. Keep grounded. Build solidly on the physical plane.

Keeping It Light

This relationship thrives on free-and-easy contacts. Its trademark is an absence of heavy responsibilities or demands, which will only drag it down and make it oppressive. The principal problem here is how to keep the relationship intact while allowing maximum freedom and choice.

The relationship's greatest success may come when its partners are biologically related. Sibling pairs are particularly favored, but parent-child combinations can also prove close and understanding. In friendships, Pisces-Aries and Gemini II's often relate to each other as if they were siblings. Family activities that include such friends, whether outings, picnics, dinners or celebrations, usually go well.

Interestingly enough, the relationship often transcends a weakness common to both partners: Pisces-Aries and Gemini II's equally have an erratic streak, which can manifest in involvement with others as flightiness or extreme undependableness. In combination, however, these two will show a high degree of thoughtfulness and responsible, well-grounded behavior. This shared attitude may include an understanding that if either partner is absent or temporarily unable to hold up their end of the deal, the remaining one will be ready to do double work for a while to keep things going.

The relationship is likely to be lively and stimulating. Gemini II's are most entertaining, and Pisces-Aries can be enchanted or at the very least amused by them. Gemini II's also have the capacity to understand and appreciate the fascinating twists and turns of the Pisces-Aries mind. As long as physical and emotional contact between them is kept light and easy, this pair may carry on a successful relationship as friends, co-workers or business associates for years.

Should the relationship move a step or two farther, toward love or marriage, the greatest difficulty will be vulnerability to new attractions and involvements. Here, keeping the communication pipeline open can guarantee a frank assessment of needs and wants. Honesty is important above all.

ADVICE: Don't take too much for granted. Keep in touch. Don't make heavy demands. Act responsibly. Keep the golden rule in mind.

Digging Deeper

This combination usually moves in a positive and mutually beneficial direction for its partners and can work out well over a broad spectrum of involvements—friendship, love, marriage. Moreover, it is characterized by the patience with which partners deal with each other's varying moods, and by their mutual encouragement in the direction of greater self-understanding. Health and stability, then, are usually important plusses in this relationship. The only question is how far it will develop, since selfishness may also be present here. In consequence, both love affairs and friendships in this combination may hinge on a delicate balance. The important issue is whether partners see real value in sustaining and deepening their bond, and in keeping their impulsiveness under control, or else give in to temptations that may ultimately prove destructive. Their attitudes toward their relationship, then, are crucial. Should they put their union first and their own individual interests second, the relationship will most likely survive. If not, it will be severely tested and, perhaps, broken.

On the positive side, Gemini III's have the energy to keep up with Pisces-Aries but also the understanding and patience to deal with their many moods. Pisces-Aries can take a lot from Gemini III's, including encouragement to get to know themselves better. Gemini III's are also good with money and can provide more impractical Pisces-Aries with the financial security they may never have had.

On the other hand, Gemini III's are extremely independent and will not tie themselves down until they are good and ready. Should they decide to marry or live with a Pisces-Aries mate, they may discover a whole new, domestic side to their personality. True, the Gemini III quest for meaning in life may leave a needy Pisces-Aries feeling neglected. But if the relationship itself can become a mutual quest, both partners' lives will be immeasurably deepened and enriched.

The Dangerous Apparition

This can be a perilous relationship but also an irresistibly magnetic one. Like a genie in a bottle, once it is released it may not be easy to control. The initial attractions here may be strong, as mesmerizing feelings weave their magic spell. Deep and dark powers far removed from everyday experience may bind the partners in a passionate embrace. Conjuring up such forces may have far-reaching consequences.

Both partners risk being swallowed up in this relationship. Their love can be profound, holding important life-lessons in store for them, but it may at the same time demand a degree of self-effacement and ego denial that cannot be healthy in the long run. Worshiping the relationship at the expense of their own selves, the partners may be called upon to sacrifice too much of their respective identities. They will have to develop toughness and practicality and to draw firm boundaries if they are to avoid a dissolution of personal responsibility and a loss of self-respect.

A casual relationship between Pisces-Aries and Gemini-Cancer is usually impossible, since they arouse such a storm of emotions in each other. They may well become adversaries or even enemies more easily than acquaintances or surface friends. Pisces-Aries are prone to being aggressively critical, but Gemini-Cancers have ways of fighting back, usually by just turning off, rejecting through silence. By withholding their enthusiasm, admiration, attention or love, Gemini-Cancers hit the Pisces-Aries ego where it really hurts.

As parents, Pisces-Aries may be extremely nurturing and protective of their Gemini-Cancer children but can also spoil them with excessive adoration. Gemini-Cancers, meanwhile, can accept and understand their Pisces-Aries children to a degree that will make them good parents overall, although they may also be upset by these children's rebelliousness. As siblings, Pisces-Aries and Gemini-Cancer will surely fight a lot but can be united by a deep bond of feeling and sympathy, which will most likely continue into adult life.

ADVICE: Proceed with care. Don't get in over your head. Keep your self-respect. Too much pleasure can be a danger signal. Serve rather than sacrifice.

Lessons to Be Learned

Mutual protection, security and moneymaking figure strongly here. Despite these common goals and bonds of feeling, however, the relationship may also involve a lack of awareness that prevents it from attaining real emotional depth. If it is confronted by difficulties, whether from inside or outside, this lack of consciousness will leave it open to psychological trauma and strife and, ultimately, will most likely break it apart. Yet the level of awareness can be raised. This may not be easy, for considerable emotional complexities will be involved, but conscious and determined efforts must be made to bring it about. To guarantee the firm internal bonding sufficient to withstand adverse circumstances, a process of learning and understanding must be developed.

Many Cancer I's are aggressive types, who need to call the shots; but if they push in this direction, it is unlikely that Pisces-Aries will be able to assume a passive role for long. Friendships and love relationships in this combination are more apt to be possible if the Pisces-Aries takes the lead while the Cancer I hangs back, letting go of control. In that case, however, the outspoken, direct nature of Pisces-Aries may wound the sensitive Cancer I, driving a wedge between them. On the plus side, both Pisces-Aries and Cancer I share traits of deep emotion and sensitivity, which may enable them to perceive the lessons necessary for this relationship to deepen and grow.

This relationship may perhaps be most effective when put in service of a common cause in which Cancer I and Pisces-Aries are partners or colleagues. Through hard and committed work, the relationship will grow not just financially but spiritually, allowing both members to build the necessary bonds of trust and to learn the pragmatic lessons about each other (and about money) that will be crucial to continued success. Fortunately, Cancer I empaths will know immediately when Pisces-Aries are not feeling well and will know how to be receptive to their moods without coddling them. A Pisces-Aries will be impressed by a Cancer I's ability to generate ideas but will insist that the necessary concentration and devotion be exercised to bring these plans to fruition.

ADVICE: Learn from your experiences. Analysis is the key to understanding. Face problems squarely. Strive to raise awareness. Work toward a common cause.

Unaffected Fascination

This naturally magnetic bond is characterized by a rich and full fantasy life. A soulful connection, the relationship features imaginative visions that can manifest on the everyday level as unusual interior decorating and design in the home, say, or through the hobby of collecting unusual objects. There may also be an attraction toward singular individuals and experiences, creating an ever-changing kaleidoscope of interests and activities.

Early on in the relationship, a choice can be made as to which of two directions to go in: ultraromantic, on the one hand, or platonic, on the other—that is, a friendship or business partnership that puts limits on personal involvement. Should the romantic plunge be taken, problems will probably arise involving attractions to third parties, and consequent jealousy, possessiveness and frustration: Pisces-Aries often have a roving eye. Cancer II's can be pretty inventive, however, in holding on to the one they love. They may be clever enough to allow Pisces-Aries the room they need and to let them think they are more free than they really are.

Rejection may be another issue should this combination turn romantic—Cancer II's who are turned down by Pisces-Aries may take it pretty hard. Becoming more convinced than ever of the need to love completely, they can sink into a pit of depression, refusing to recognize the hopelessness of their desire for the Pisces-Aries. Cancer II's must be very careful of giving up their self-esteem or their dignity in such a situation. They must not become addicted to unrequited love.

When this relationship goes well, on the other hand, whether it be romantic or platonic, the partners' mutual appreciation of each other's imaginative qualities will be more than enough to keep it going for years. Should it manifest in the work sphere as a career element in fields such as advertising, public relations, design or fashion, there is no limit to the success it can achieve, since this duo has a strong understanding of the

Zealous Reform

This relationship carries the conviction that it knows what is right, not only for its own members but for the rest of the world, too. Not content to rest with this knowledge, the relationship seeks to implement its often revolutionary ideas, struggling to reform and reorganize other relationships, businesses, families and social groups. Free to give advice, this matchup can prove a potent force for change in its immediate social sphere. Advice is not always appreciated, of course, nor do groups easily change, so this duo must be ready for uphill battles in convincing others of the rightness of its views; but it is a pairing of great charisma. In argument, furthermore, it does not stick to cold, hard facts but works to persuade through displays of temperament as well as of charm. Nor is it easily dissuaded—opposition will usually only spur this combination on to increased effort.

Interesting interpersonal dynamics emerge within the relationship itself. As people, Cancer III's are probably tougher than Pisces-Aries usually like. Realists, they are unlikely to cut Pisces-Aries any slack and will force them to face up to their deficiencies. This may make for tensions, but it also means that Cancer III's can make good managers, and sometimes even spouses, for Pisces-Aries, whose best qualities they do recognize and appreciate, and whom they may be able to direct toward an attainable goal.

When Pisces-Aries take their usual direct approach with Cancer III's on an important issue, the latter may seem to agree with them at first, mainly to avoid argument, but will later work in a subtle way to reorient them. Pisces-Aries who figure this out may feel manipulated by it, creating resentments that may ultimately result in a direct challenge to Cancer III's authority. But Cancer III's may cannily allow Pisces-Aries to think they're in charge, thus avoiding friction while still maintaining control.

The stability and solidity needed in a marriage or other long-standing love relationship are usually absent here. There may well be an attraction, but chances are that any resulting sexual involvement will be brief, albeit intense. Greater understanding may emerge after an affair is over, when a more permanent friendship can well ensue.

Tuned In

This can be an exciting and deeply personal relationship, focused on being oneself and expressing highly individual emotions. Both partners bring to it the gifts of intuition, passion and empathy, qualities associated with the relationship's dominant elements, fire (Aries and Leo) and water (Pisces and Cancer). In combination, these gifts reinforce each other, and the relationship further contributes to them with a high degree of mental and physical compatibility. The matchup, then, is marked by easy communication and sensuous enjoyment. It will never place undue demands on its partners, since there will always be a free and easy exchange between them. Neither will ever have to make excuses for their behavior or to suppress their basic instincts.

This combination's easygoing nature will make any type of relationship involving it likely to succeed, including work or business. On balance, though, it is best suited to love and friendship. Pisces-Aries-Cancer-Leo lovers generally feel good about their relationship and are for the most part satisfied. They have a silent enjoyment and understanding of each other—they are on the same wavelength. Here just a look tells the whole story. In such a relationship, love and affection may be expressed in an easy way, without overt displays of emotion or a need to impress others. Marriage can be successful, too, as long as a stable financial and emotional foundation is established. Providing this kind of security will take some work, and both partners may have to give up some individual freedom and set some limits on their impulsiveness. In the family, the empathy between these two favors both parent-child and sibling pairing.

Pisces-Aries and Cancer-Leos must be careful, however, not to give up too many of their individual prerogatives, particularly when it comes to other people. They have a need and a desire to share with each other, and they may well be open enough to share a circle of mutual friends. It is also possible, however, that jealousy and possessiveness may surface as undermining factors. Putting their relationship first while also keeping certain areas of their lives private and exclusive will provide the needed stability.

ADVICE: Share, but don't give it all away. Sometimes you have to speak your mind. Don't take too much for granted. Respect the intimacy of others.

 PISCES-ARIES CUSP

Pulling Together

The central issue in this relationship is that of dominance and independence. No matter how strongly, or with what truth, the voice of authority speaks, rebellious impulses arise that cry out to be heard. Recognition is a big issue here: how can a small, intimate voice be recognized when the acknowledged authority has just asserted the facts of the case? What's left to say—perhaps a small joke, a slightly different spin, a new idea? And what if, just once, the mighty authority is wrong?

No relationship can be completely dominated by one of its partners—or if it can, it isn't really a relationship at all. In this one, Leo I dominance can be simply too much to handle for Pisces-Aries, who may just back off. Furthermore, since Leo I's spend so much time on their careers, it may be a struggle for them to give Pisces-Aries their true attention. Yet interaction is possible here, if not in the areas of love and friendship, then certainly in that of work, where Pisces-Aries can supply imaginative ideas that Leo I's can shape, form and then implement. Much can be learned in this relationship about both the value of having a strong ego and the problems such an ego can create in a person's interactions with the world. Pisces-Aries, for their part, struggling to hold their own in the relationship, may learn something about the dangers of going too far toward self-assertiveness. Insecurities can be aroused that will throw the relationship temporarily off balance but may also lead to an acknowledgment of vulnerability, an admission of mistakes, an openness. These are the lessons of being human. Moreover, the distracting elements in this relationship can be something other than an annoyance; they can lead to relaxation and fun.

The issue of dependency also appears in parent-child interaction. Authoritarian Leo I parents can provoke rebellion in Pisces-Aries children or cause them to withdraw, wounded. A greater danger, perhaps, is overdependence, with the Pisces-Aries child worshipping the apparently omniscient Leo I parent. A balance must be found that allows for a productive interdependency in which the relationship can grow without stultifying polarization.

ADVICE: Allow vulnerability. Admit mistakes. Build on mutual experiences. Allow the small voice to be heard. Encourage interdependent efforts.

High-Flying Eagles

Simply put, this relationship focuses on freedom. Given that focus, it includes a lot of impatience and unwillingness to compromise—but also a real directness, and a dislike of subterfuge and dishonesty. The other side of that coin is that any deep psychological subtext may prove unfathomable to the parties and too trying to figure out. The time, inclination and ability to understand, and to express full-blown sympathy, may be wanting or even absent.

The relationship will probably be at its most successful in friendship—as long as individual freedom can be maintained. If it can, the partners should be able to live up to their responsibilities. Leo II's are among the most loyal people in the year, and Pisces-Aries will benefit from being able to count on them for help in times of crisis. The emotional ups and downs and occasional despair of Pisces-Aries can be difficult for Leo II's to deal with, but they will gain satisfaction from their ability to help out in an objective way and from seeing the positive results of their contributions. Both partners will value this friendship and will be serious about maintaining it.

The fiery elements of the Pisces-Aries–Leo II relationship may well find expression in a love affair, but Leo II's may be too demanding and controlling for Pisces-Aries in the physical realm. Although initially charmed by the more ephemeral qualities of Pisces-Aries, Leo II's can also lack a certain sensitivity, so that Pisces-Aries will ultimately be left feeling unappreciated and unfulfilled. Should a Leo II attempt an outright assault on the affections of a Pisces-Aries or be too aggressive in speech or action, the Pisces-Aries may get turned off and just quietly slip away, finding the whole affair not worth the trouble. This relationship will rarely achieve long life. Not only will it be undermined by problems, but that constant need for individual freedom will make a marriage or permanent living situation hard to maintain. On the other hand, however, an admission of outright failure will often be slow in coming, so that some relationships in this combination continue on stubbornly when they should really be abandoned. Long-suffering attitudes often accompany problem relationships. Pisces-Aries–Leo II is no different.

ADVICE: Freedom may be important, but so is cooperation. Admitting failure can be a positive step—to give up can be to gain.

Taming the Tiger

There is a need in this relationship to take wayward energies in hand and to shape and direct them. Passions run high here, but any overbearing energies, whether within the relationship or outside it, will not be submitted to; those passions must be mastered, so long as this is achieved with dignity and choice. In the best-case scenario, the Pisces-Aries–Leo III combination can give a project direction or can bring together subtle feelings and define them. No attempt should be made to break this matchup's strongly independent spirit.

Since it will be extremely difficult for this relationship's partners to admit their mistakes, contention is likely to arise between them, with each person claiming something like infallibility. The end of a knock-down, drag-out argument may come in the form of exhaustion or uneasy truce but rarely of compromise or apology. Perhaps the most realistic approach is just to agree to disagree, or at least to agree not to argue. Unfortunately, this will do little to help solve the relationship's problems. Hard work will be required to keep the channels of communication open and to move toward building acceptance and understanding.

Both Pisces-Aries and Leo III's are emotionally deep individuals who live in a world of complex feelings. The passionate aspect of an erotic relationship between them may well become an outlet for each of them to express such feelings, whether positive or negative, and their relationship may accordingly prove highly satisfying and even long-lasting. The control of tumultuous energies being crucial in this combination, however, strong emotions that threaten the relationship's stability will probably lead to its breakup. Even so, it may reach an intensity that both partners will remember for a lifetime. Should some kind of balance or direction of the determined and willful energies present in this relationship be possible, much can be achieved.

Whether in friendships or love affairs, the key to deepening trust in this relationship may lie in the area of admitting mistakes and weaknesses. Any act of forgiveness here, any resistance to a tendency to blame or lay on guilt trips, may prove a major triumph. Ultimately, the taming of the tiger requires perseverance and respect.

Hidden Language

Imbalance figures strongly in this relationship, but easy communication is likely to be a stabilizing factor. The Pisces-Aries–Leo-Virgo union likes to focus outside itself, sharing facts or gossip about others, or subjects that are off limits to others, and the secretive or private tone that often results from this preference may become a basis for friendship: essentially these two have their own, often whispered language. Care must be taken in such a relationship not to fall into patterns of isolation that cut the duo off from the world, so that it loses essential human contacts.

Despite its ability to put an “us against the world” face on things, the relationship suffers from an inherent instability, which demands significant adjustments from both parties to counter. The often precarious nature of the relationship creates excitement and unpredictability but provides little incentive to complete the ordinary tasks of everyday life. Leo-Virgos are often attracted to Pisces-Aries but may keep their feelings to themselves for a long time. If, when they finally open up, they find that the Pisces-Aries are similarly attracted, the results may be overpowering and tumultuous. Should their feelings not immediately prove mutual, on the other hand, Leo-Virgos may unhappily back off rather than hanging in there. Generally quite protective of their feelings, they will usually avoid or run from a situation in which they feel rejected, rather than masochistically seeking it out.

Although Pisces-Aries and Leo-Virgo share the common element of fire (Aries and Leo both being fire signs), watery Pisces is more concerned with feeling and earthy Virgo with practical matters and work. The fiery element can lend passion to any love relationship, and at least in the short term these two may climb to heights of sensuous experience. It is the element that is missing, however—air—and its strong mental orientation that can become the real reasons for the success of a Pisces-Aries–Leo-Virgo relationship. By clever and judicious planning, for example, this couple may secure a good financial basis for themselves. The development of common sense will prove a strong stabilizing factor that can always be counted on.

ADVICE: Excitement is not the best goal. Use your common sense. Don't make your communication too exclusive. Beware of isolation.

Giant Steps

It is characteristic of this relationship to reach for the stars but keep its feet on the ground. Free, often chaotic and fantasy-rich thoughts and actions are typical of it, but it can effectively manage and ground them through the establishment of a few simple rules. Bringing order to the different areas of life, at home and in the workplace, will tend to counterbalance more scattered energies. Conversely, it is also true that this combination's acceptance of a little freedom of spirit will encourage its partners to step out of a more formal mode, so that their relationship will allow them to become more expressive and vibrant.

The relationship is usually more successful in friendship, work or marriage than in love, where unstable elements can surface that will quickly lead the partners to states of emotional upset. Unpredictable or impulsive feelings can be powerful agents here. In order to remain calm and make measured decisions, particularly financial ones, a ruthless ban of any disruptive energies may become necessary, no matter how enjoyable and attractive these may be. If the relationship is to survive, and particularly if it is a sexual one, practical considerations may demand a firm hand with self-destructive impulses.

Virgo I's often have the problem of getting involved with exactly the wrong people. Pisces-Aries may well fall into that number, particularly if they are needy types who will drain Virgo I energy. On the other hand, many Pisces-Aries are fun-loving enough to allow Virgo I's a respite from their own compulsiveness and workaholic tendencies. The principal problems between these two are that Virgo I's may have difficulty with that whirlwind Pisces-Aries energy and may have to withdraw into their own private world, while Pisces-Aries may be unable to stand the rule-making and prohibitive attitudes of Virgo I's, particularly around money.

Nonetheless, this relationship can sometimes assume gigantic proportions and, like an overly expansive and energetic plant, may need to be trimmed and cut back to size. Finding a proper sense of proportion, both within the relationship and in regard to the daily life around it, is perhaps the most pressing challenge of all.

ADVICE: Cut back on activities. Don't be so dominant. Keep things in perspective. Strive for balance and proportion. Don't ignore pressing matters.

Intrepid Exploration

It is not uncommon for a relationship to spring from a misunderstanding, but a Pisces-Aries–Virgo II meeting has a higher than average probability of resulting from such an event or from some other slightly unusual occurrence: both these parties have a tendency to be misunderstood or misread by others. On the plus side, this means that these two may find in each other a mutual point of empathy. Two negatives form a positive; similarly, the relationship that results from this synergistic combination can be far stronger than the individuals who constitute it. Fittingly, given the seeming misfit nature of the two parties, this relationship focuses on creating a private world, with time being given to inner exploration and recognition. Once bonds of trust and sharing are formed, cathartic and even ecstatic moments of mutual revelation may ensue. The duo may then be ready for further challenges, both in areas of psychological and spiritual growth and in the issues of the outer world—family, society, work.

It is possible for Pisces-Aries and Virgo II's to form a strong lifelong bond, whether as friends, lovers or spouses. Obstacles will arise, of course, but the mutual understanding between these two can be so great that they will be undaunted by personal problems and challenges, and may in fact be stimulated by them. One of the greatest difficulties of this relationship may lie in being tied to old scripts—negative parental or familial attitudes from childhood, for example. Role patterns like these can lead to acting out, in hurtful and denigrating ways. But these stances from the past can be recognized, acknowledged and released, or at the very least defused.

One great danger of this pairing is that it will develop into a kind of folie à deux, becoming restricted to a mutually supportive but highly private world in which the pair is confined by the belief that it marches to a different drummer. Actively building bridges to fellow human beings is essential, perhaps with the Virgo II making career contacts and the Pisces-Aries taking the lead socially. The relationship's flowering, and the mental health of both parties, may well depend on the success of such efforts.

ADVICE: Beware of dependencies. Don't cut yourself off from the world. Engage in give-and-take with others. Keep pushing back your frontiers.

Well-Grounded Imagination

This relationship may well address itself to big projects born out of wide-ranging ideas and implemented with practiced expertise. The ambition of these projects may arouse expectations that are not always fulfilled, however, for strict maintenance is required even once the train is on the rails, and this relationship may not sustain such long-range efforts. Disappointments and setbacks may undermine the relationship's strength, particularly if heavy criticism and blame come to the surface.

This combination does not exhibit particularly great emotional strength and unity. Virgo III's tend to be extremely discriminating and careful in the expression of emotion; they have a good deal of control over their feelings and are apt to make deliberate decisions in any given situation as to how much or how little of themselves they want to reveal. Pisces-Aries are far less selective—in fact, they don't really choose to express emotion but do so naturally. It will be difficult, then, for Virgo III's to handle the more direct and unpremeditated feelings of Pisces-Aries. Moreover, Pisces-Aries are very sensitive to criticism of any kind—a Virgo III forte.

Unforgiving attitudes may dominate this relationship at times, and rarely is a second chance given when major mistakes are made. Once a promise is not kept, hopes held out in the future will be treated warily. Interpersonal bonds may not survive highly stressful emotional encounters.

Much can be learned in this relationship, and much accomplished, but not usually in the spheres of friendship, love or marriage. It is in acquaintanceship, work or in an advisory capacity that the matchup works best, particularly when there is not a lot of intimate contact. The combination's ingredients of fertile imagination and hardheaded realism may well interact to advance career success. And in the family sphere, where Virgo III's ground more diffuse Pisces-Aries energies, and Pisces-Aries stimulate Virgo III's to take action, a successful dynamic between two siblings or between parent and child may benefit all concerned.

The cusps of Pisces-Aries and Virgo-Libra fall on the spring and the fall equinoxes, respectively; this rare and unusual matchup, then, is governed by the year's only equinoctial opposition, the only moment to carry the perfectly balanced energies of equal-length days and nights. As you might expect, the relationship between Pisces-Aries and Virgo-Libra is highly magnetic and magical, and is filled with mutual fascination, particularly in the area of physical or aesthetic sensuousness. (Should it manifest in the area of love, in fact, it may well evolve into a more permanent situation.) Pisces-Aries are emotion-and-intuition types (their elements being water and fire) and Virgo-Libras are sensation-and-thought types (their elements being earth and air); they share no common element in their makeup and have very different capabilities and outlooks. A relationship that joins them, however, combines all four elements equally and, although it may require some balancing and finesse of energies, is synergistically more powerful than the individuals who make it up.

Pisces-Aries are stronger in the subjective sphere, Virgo-Libras in the objective one. Pisces-Aries tend to be dreamers, following hunches and expressing themselves directly; Virgo-Libras often find it hard to express deep feelings and feel more comfortable dealing with down-to-earth, everyday concerns. As a working duo, whether of parents, co-workers, teammates or business partners, each can offer what the other lacks. Between them they cover the bases.

Problems arise between these two when Pisces-Aries grow impatient with a quality of Virgo-Libras that they see as superficiality or a concern with the surface phenomena of life. Virgo-Libras, on the other hand, may see Pisces-Aries as overly troubled or too involved with emotional matters that get them bogged down in inaction or indecision. They may also often feel that Pisces-Aries lack common sense and tend to fly off impulsively in the wrong direction. Accused of impracticality, Pisces-Aries may charge Virgo-Libras with being too materialistic. Despite the strong attraction in this relationship, it can begin to wane if the partners begin to lose respect for each other, with their manifest differences leading to serious animosity and conflict.

ADVICE: Work together. Maintain respect. Accept differences; use them to your benefit. Recognize emotional needs. Be more accepting and less combative.

Confrontational Honesty

This relationship involves a great deal of honesty and openness—perhaps too much; its success will depend, in fact, on its ability to cope with direct confrontations. These challenges may demand adjustments that are at odds with the basic nature of both personalities, and that they feel compromise their individuality. Giving in to the other partner's demands in a desperate effort to please, and to make the relationship work, may result in a loss of pride and self-esteem. Meaningful compromise is essential if the relationship is to work out in the long term, but giving ground may, unfortunately, be difficult or impossible. Battles between the partners will put tremendous strains on day-to-day living.

This is particularly true in sexual and financial matters, but in many other areas, too, the negative emotions created by the frank attitudes characteristic of this relationship are often too much to handle and arouse insecurity and unhappiness. The spotlight here often falls on the Pisces-Aries personality and what Libra I finds wrong with it. Should these two live together, as family members, mates or friends, Libra I's may see themselves as advisers to their Pisces-Aries partners, whose problems they will try to solve and whose needs they will tend. Pisces-Aries can, for their part, come to depend on this support and may even hold on to certain problems because they provide a way to gain attention. Libra I's, however, can easily swing from overinterest to disinterest, leaving Pisces-Aries baffled.

Pisces-Aries generally make few demands on Libra I's in terms of asking them to change, but one request they will certainly make is that the Libra I's open up and be sympathetic. Emotional honesty is so important to Pisces-Aries that if they cannot get it from their partner they will become depressed, unhappy and restless. To avoid these funks, they will keep pushing harder for honesty, even if this leads to unpleasantness. Real progress can be made in this relationship by open discussion, as long as fairness and justice keep such communication from degenerating into continual bickering.

ADVICE: Try to be more responsive. Show sympathy and love openly. Demand emotional honesty. Don't be afraid to fight, but avoid bickering.

Comfortable Enjoyment

Both the strength and the weakness of this relationship lie in its easygoing and pleasure-oriented nature. The partners' similar aesthetic tastes provide the basis for an enjoyable life built around the themes of comfort, sensuality and beauty, and the main attitude here is one of mutual support, in a wide variety of areas; this encourages not only career success but fun in social interactions. Yet unless the relationship is able to transcend its relaxed, satisfied quality and give its partners direction, it is likely to stagnate. Firm goals, rules, realistic deadlines and a bit of push now and then, even if these run counter to natural inclinations, will be needed if progress is to be made. Not only financial and other practical matters but also the natural love or friendship that these two feel for each other will benefit from a little toughening of attitudes. True spiritual growth may then be expected as well.

Libra II's tend to give a lot in love relationships and need to be needed. Should a Pisces-Aries accept their attention, affection and understanding, they may become dependent on satisfying this mate or lover and will suffer from an estrangement or breakup more than the Pisces-Aries will. Pisces-Aries can be quite selfish in satisfying their own needs and may ignore Libra II's for long periods of time, perhaps even getting involved with others. The long-suffering aspects of Libra II's, and their self-hurtful tendencies, may emerge during such times of trouble. Blaming themselves for what has happened often results in a serious loss of self-esteem.

Many Pisces-Aries have a crying need to know themselves on a deep level, and Libra II's can be very helpful in this respect, since they often make good counselors and are ready to lend a sympathetic ear. Pisces-Aries can be quite exasperating in falling back into old habits, however, and Libra II's will become increasingly impatient with such behavior over time.

ADVICE: Don't dream your life away. Take action in order to improve. Push yourself a bit more. Raise expectations and goals. Be the best you can.

Scaling the Heights

This relationship may appear rock solid and highly responsible, since success and scaling the heights of society's ladders are its consummate focus. Ambition, however, is not always enough, particularly when individual needs are neglected or suppressed, overrun by this duo's ambitious drives. The relationship can be flamboyant and exciting but may not be stable enough to survive the mundane demands of living together, particularly in marriage. Putting energies in the service of business or social groups will be highly stimulating and may result in new levels of achievement. Friendships or partnerships are particularly favored, especially when engaged in far-reaching projects. The ideal would find these two in businesses or occupations in which the relationship's charismatic and dynamic elements can find full expression in innovating new projects, establishing relations with clients or making sales.

A passionate love affair between a Pisces-Aries and a Libra III cannot by any means be ruled out, but the relationship's volatile nature may ensure a rough ride, with quite a few emotional ups and downs. Perhaps the biggest problem in such a romance is that Pisces-Aries may not be tough enough to cope with the tremendous self-confident career drive of Libra III's, which may leave them feeling abandoned or neglected for long periods of time. Bringing out their insecure, nervous side, such neglect may lead to recriminations, anger and resentment, which Libra III's will probably view with annoyance as an intrusion on their valuable time. The most immature aspects of Pisces-Aries may emerge in such moments, and Libra III's can come to feel they are dealing with a petulant child.

The breakdowns of communication and concomitant problems that surface at these times can be avoided if more honesty is practiced in the first place. Learning to be critical yet accepting, focused yet open, and practical yet emotional is key. Above all, these partners must not reject occasional lightheartedness, flamboyance or idiosyncrasy, which can only give the relationship character and individuality.

ADVICE: Don't forget human considerations. You are not a machine. Allow for error and individuality. Do not suppress personal expression.

The Raging Heart

This relationship is likely to be an uncertain, unconventional and highly unpredictable one. In some cases it may develop an addiction to sex and love, in which both partners exert claims on each other and are unable to get free of their feelings. Such relationships can classically produce extremes of both pleasure and pain, with both peak experiences and depressions manifesting with some regularity, and this one is no exception. To avoid emotional, psychological or in extreme cases physical damage, limits may have to be placed on what is and is not allowed. Pisces-Aries and Libra-Scorpios share a common element, water (Pisces and Scorpio are both water signs), which represents the faculty of emotion in the human personality. Since Aries and Libra are fire and air signs, respectively, Pisces-Aries and Libra-Scorpios can make an explosive combination, particularly in the realm of feelings. Should theirs be a love relationship, it is likely to be a highly passionate one.

This pairing is not recommended for work or marital partnerships, since emotional conflicts are sooner or later likely to emerge and to become increasingly frequent, disrupting the work at hand. Should the relationship manifest as a friendship, it is likely to go well. Care must be taken to guard against jealousy, however, particularly when the partners share friends whose attention or affection they seek. When they are together with a group of their peers, Pisces-Aries and Libra-Scorpios can end up competing intensely with each other for the spotlight. On the other hand, each may well stimulate the other's more flamboyant side in social gatherings, making for a lively and at times contentious exchange that those around them may find highly entertaining, if it doesn't go too far. And this is perhaps the secret to harmony in this relationship—to tone down excess and learn to live at a more ordinary, albeit perhaps boring, level of experience.

ADVICE: Avoid excess, but don't lose the spark. Keep on an even keel. Don't sacrifice intensity, but be reasonable. Beware of burnout.

Paying Dues

This relation usually begins in suspicion and distrust. Actions, not words, will be needed for each partner to convince the other and to engender mutual faith. If a bond is to be forged, the relationship's steel must go through the fire if it is to be tempered and dependable. But once the parties have paid their dues and endured the trials and tribulations that the relationship requires, openness and honesty can be achieved. Much will depend on the continued investment of time spent in serious talk and in the airing of different points of view. Only then may sympathy and understanding grow, and with them a deepening of the relationship and a measure of permanence.

Actions alone are not enough to convince Scorpio I's; ethical intent is vitally important to them. But Pisces-Aries often do things impulsively, without thinking. Even if their intention is pure enough in their own minds, they may consequently get into trouble with Scorpio I's, who tend to be suspicious of their apparent innocence and often harbor nagging suspicions about them, finding it hard to believe that they didn't have something deceptive or downright dishonest in mind after all.

Such suspicions may undercut this relationship, whether it appears in the realm of friendship, love or work. Furthermore, since neither of these types is particularly strong in self-understanding, deceptions of all types may actually abound. Pisces-Aries find their weaknesses and deficiencies harder to hide than Scorpio I's, who rarely if ever can be caught putting themselves at a disadvantage, particularly in any kind of argument. Soon learning that they can be hurt by Scorpio I's, since they are more vulnerable, Pisces-Aries may become less willing to open up, and more guarded. In the family sphere, this relationship may feature constant battles, particularly between siblings. A Scorpio I parent can place very heavy demands on a Pisces-Aries child, who may react with outright rebellion. Pisces-Aries cannot tolerate the Scorpio I need to control, so the outlook is often not good. Although increased affection and protectiveness may surface through struggle, marriages between Pisces-Aries and Scorpio I's are not particularly recommended.

ADVICE: Don't always doubt intentions. Take things as they are. Faith is often more important than evaluation. Try to lighten up and have fun.

Dark Star

A visual image representing this relationship might be that of a lonely solar system with a single dark star at its center—for this is an exclusive relationship, which may keep others away. Intimacy and complex interpersonal interactions are the keynotes here. The deep bonds of feelings and sympathy in the Dark Star relationship may be both mutually rewarding and long lasting. Because this duo shares thoughts and experiences so easily, other family members, spouses and friends will have to be understanding about their intimacy and control any envy or resentment.

Both parties generally feel favorable about this relationship, particularly if it is a long-lasting friendship. Yet Pisces-Aries need emotional change much more than Scorpio II's; they occasionally feel frustrated about being fixed in this orbit and may want to roam. If Scorpio II's in turn feel threatened by the other party's outside interests, they may cling to the relationship more tightly than ever.

Emotions are tricky in this matchup, particularly when it involves love and marriage. Here more depressive aspects may surface in the relationship, leading to worry and brooding. Part of the problem is an inability to maintain objectivity and boundaries, and a concomitant merging of personalities. Should drinking or other drugs be involved, shared addictions could prove extremely hard to conquer. Another possible form of addiction might involve sex and/or love, in which case separation would yield anxiety.

Should these two live or work together, Scorpio II's may become upset with Pisces-Aries over what they see as financial irresponsibility. Money is an important issue for Scorpio II's, representing control and power, whereas Pisces-Aries may view it much less seriously. Another area of conflict that can arise in day-to-day situations involves tempo: where Pisces-Aries are impulsive, Scorpio II's need to chew things over for long periods of time before acting. This may well result in friction, with Pisces-Aries always urging their slower-moving partner to hurry up, and Scorpio II's trying to get their more nervous partner to calm down.

ADVICE: Take a break once in a while. Don't be so exclusive—include others in your plans. Brighten up. Worry and depression can drag you down.

Captivating Charisma

Highly persuasive and convincing, this relationship exerts a magnetic influence on those around it, encouraging trust. (The flip side of the coin is that it can also encourage dependency in third parties who are drawn to it.) And yet, curiously, the power of Pisces-Aries and Scorpio III's to convince each other is far less than the power of the relationship as a unit—probably since each partner is too skilled in the arts of seduction and charm to fall for each other's tricks. Because of the relationship's ability to persuade, which usually derives from an ability to read the intentions of others quickly and clearly, there will of necessity be a fair amount of honesty and openness between the parties. Yet in certain crucial areas, facts or feelings may be deftly hidden and true emotions suppressed. Out of an instinctive fear of getting hurt, the other partner may choose to turn a blind eye to such secrets.

Relationships with Scorpio III's bring out the sensuous side of Pisces-Aries, allowing them to relax and to bring their nervousness under control. If there is a sexual attraction here, it is likely to result in a prolonged and complicated love affair. Marriage or a deep commitment to living together, however, is not particularly recommended for this matchup, since if serious problems arise, dreamier Pisces-Aries will tend to flee, while more realistic Scorpio III's will unilaterally modify or even break off the relationship. When things are good between these two, in other words, they can be very good, but when things turn sour, neither party may feel the relationship is worth the exhausting effort required to put it right.

As parents or bosses, Scorpio III's may prove much too authoritarian for Pisces-Aries. As business partners or equal colleagues, however, these two can be unbeatable, the persuasive character of their relationship working wonders on those they encounter. Pisces-Aries imagination and energy and strong Scorpio III money sense are underlying factors. The magnetism and charisma of this duo can woo others to buy any of its concepts, services or products, or to follow any cause.

ADVICE: Be truthful. Persuasiveness may encourage others to be overdependent. Winning isn't everything. Examine motives carefully.

The Slumbering Volcano

This relationship manifests primarily on the physical plane, with striving, fervent emotions struggling for supremacy. In fact, the synergy of this combination is less restful than fiercely passionate and even, occasionally, violent. This is because Pisces-Aries and Scorpio-Sagittarius are both water-fire combinations, each apprehending the world primarily through the faculties of feeling and intuition. So, while on the surface these two cusp people have a lot in common and should be able to understand each other quite well, in fact a relationship between them brings out their weakest elements: indecisiveness and a fiery temperament.

The great challenge facing this duo, then, is to maintain the dedication, conviction and mental concentration that will counteract the relationship's wildly veering nature and keep it on track. On the positive side, the determination to stick together is capable of becoming a transcendent goal that can hold the relationship intact. On the negative, this can discourage each partner from risking serious personal change independently of the other one. A kind of stubborn loyalty may develop here, one that neither Pisces-Aries nor Scorpio-Sagittarians may have felt so strongly for another person before.

Both of these types are extremely sensitive, and quite reactive and vulnerable to each other's actions and criticisms. Better suited to action than to reflection, each has a strong desire for success; as long as this drive can be limited to their careers, rather than spilling over into their own relationship as personal competition, harmony may be maintained. As friends or lovers, Pisces-Aries and Scorpio-Sagittarians will have a demanding, intense relationship, which they will want to live to the fullest. The dynamic of both business and marital partnerships will be complex, particularly over the question of who plays the dominant role. Either partner may choose to stay in the background for periods of time, letting the other take the lead; this good sense and diplomacy augurs well for the relationship's longevity. Wielding influence behind the scenes is the most effective means of control here—the outside world may know little of what goes on privately in this highly personal and mysterious relationship.

ADVICE: Let go occasionally. Find time to relax. Follow natural and personal urges, too. You don't always have to hide. Be more transparent.

A Roller Coaster Ride

This relationship's emotional ups and downs make for instability. Outspoken and impulsive attitudes are prominent here, and peace and harmony are not the pairing's keywords. But the matchup isn't boring, either, and flying sparks can ignite passions that may lead to a tumultuous love affair. Both of these personalities will tell it like it is, demanding honesty from each other and refusing to hold back the truth themselves. Keeping things out in the open is the habit of Sagittarius I's more than of Pisces-Aries, however, and the latter may use more indirect, more manipulative methods to get their way.

Pisces-Aries and Sagittarius I's share their appreciation of nature and their delight in vigorous exercise or training. Whether as friends or partners in pursuits involving sports, fitness or adventure, they will feed off a reserve of mutual inspiration and excitement, in which challenge and competition figure prominently. A strong emotional bond can develop in such situations but does not have to and, in fact, may prove counterproductive to the activity at hand. Through bettering personal records and paying attention to technical matters, both of these highly subjective individuals will be able to cultivate the objectivity they so desperately need in their lives, personally and as a team.

In business and career matters, this relationship brings tremendous imaginative force and physical drive to its work, whether involving sales or services. Keeping its whirlwind energies under control may prove a problem, however; the matchup's fiery aspects may undercut the stability of its projects. Except in matters of fiscal planning and the handling of money, where the Sagittarius I is often the more capable, it will often be the task of the Pisces-Aries to make recommendations and plans that will put the talents of the Sagittarius I to best use. Unless both partners maintain a firm grip on reality and keep their contentiousness under control, they will repeatedly sabotage their best chances for success, particularly in the area of finances.

ADVICE: Even out your mood swings. Maintain objectivity in money matters. Use your common sense more. Keep your physical impulses natural but under control.

Inventive Entertainment

Idiosyncratic and quirky this is one of the more unusual relationships of the year. Enjoyment and fun are the hallmarks here, and also mutual understanding and support. This imaginative and stimulating matchup often finds itself at the center of a circle of friends, on which it usually has a positive influence. Comedy, play-acting and a love of games, even of gambling, may be some of the areas in which the relationship's particular chemistry works to lend liveliness to any gathering. Also important is the fact that this matchup allows its partners the opportunity to go their own ways, without negative criticism, blame or attempts at reform.

Both parties to this relationship are usually comfortable in it, since it offers a solution to the loneliness and asocial tendencies of which both are typically capable. As a team, Pisces-Aries and Sagittarius II's often lose a lot of their shyness and come out in the open. Living together may be difficult, however, since neither of them usually shows much interest in discharging domestic duties and tasks. Without some kind of formal agreement over the division of labor, this can lead to a fairly chaotic situation. Should Pisces-Aries and Sagittarius II's have children, one or another of their offspring may quite possibly have to assume responsibility for keeping the house in good running order. Not surprisingly, this combination is not particularly recommended for business relations and partnerships, since it may lack an important practical element.

Both of these personalities have an extroverted side, which may occasionally get out of hand in the case of Sagittarius II's, who often have problems getting to know themselves at a deep level. More sensitive, Pisces-Aries may be able to hold up the mirror to Sagittarius II emotions, helping in the process of self-discovery. As teachers, friends or guides, in fact, Pisces-Aries may well instigate or nurture spiritual awakenings in Sagittarius II's. In this case, however, Sagittarius II's must be careful not to become dependent on or to idolize Pisces-Aries, who may seem the only ones capable of understanding them, but are not.

Who's on First

The expression of a balanced sense of authority is the primary theme here. So long as both parties understand that it is the coupling itself that carries weight, things will run smoothly. This relationship works well when it is directed outward into the world, or, possibly, when it involves parenting. But neither member of this duo is happy playing second fiddle. It's not that struggle is the order of the day, but there often is a sense of discomfort over the role each party plays, with each one wishing to assert him- or herself as the authority figure. In consequence, subtle bids for power can undermine this combination, and long-term love or marital relationships are not particularly favored. What is most difficult here, however, is the obsessive inability to leave things alone, which makes an even, harmonious daily life hard to achieve.

The expansive manner of Sagittarius III's may be a bit intimidating or off-putting for Pisces-Aries, who do not think on quite so lofty or grand a scale. Sagittarius III's have a breezy and self-assured air, and recognize few limitations or barriers; Pisces-Aries need their privacy and resent intrusions on their space. The relationship may accordingly bring out Pisces-Aries' shy side, or even seriously erode their self-confidence, though they can also be capable of defending themselves assertively. On the other hand, Sagittarius III's may find themselves vulnerable to the fascination of Pisces-Aries, who know how to get their way through subtle forms of emotional manipulation. Pisces-Aries will not be above using the protective instincts of Sagittarius III's, or their need for admiration, to control them. Should a mutual attraction arise between these two types, a friendship may well ensue, with each enjoying the other's direct approach. In love, emotional differences prove a real stumbling block: Sagittarius III's tend to be passionate types, who give their all only in the most intimate moments, whereas Pisces-Aries are more sensuous, needing pleasure in regular doses throughout the day. The relationship probably works best as a business or, better, a creative partnership, particularly when both partners can act as the authority on their own topics or subject areas.

A Paradoxical Partnership

This relationship secretly yearns for ease of interchange and natural, childlike expression. At certain rare moments of mutual repose and comfort, this ideal can be reached; a strong intuitive sense allows each partner to know what the other wants. Perversely, however, individual willfulness and stubbornness can make each person refuse to satisfy the other's desires. Only strong determination and conviction will truly allow both parties to lower their guard and enjoy each other.

The main problem here is that Pisces-Aries and Sagittarius-Capricorns have very different approaches to everyday matters. Should they end up in a relationship, in fact, many people will probably wonder how they found each other. Strong clashes and stormy confrontations will usually epitomize their daily relations, and there will be periodic irritation and resentment. Both Pisces-Aries and Sagittarius-Capricorns have fiery sides to their natures, and they may have to establish a conscious truce to keep from upsetting harmony in the family or workplace. But although they may never fully accept each other's ways, true mutual understanding does exist at a deep level (albeit often with a certain accompanying sense of disapproval). And the relationship is characterized by honesty, no matter how painful. This is not one of those friendships that depend on flattery to keep up appearances and interests.

Both parties may somewhat resent this relationship yet be unable to do anything about it. Unfortunately, the solution they choose may be to express their resentment by making things even more difficult for each other. They may also procrastinate and hang back from expressing their feelings for long periods, then suddenly and unexpectedly break out in an emotional outburst. Both Pisces-Aries and Sagittarius-Capricorns have a tremendous need to share (whether opportunities, money, friends or other resources), but they also have problems in doing so. Marriages, friendships or business relationships between these two are not really recommended, then. Yet their love-hate relationships, however unstable or unpredictable, may go on for years.

ADVICE: Let your guard down more. Try to be reasonable. Find the easy way. Don't set up roadblocks. Things can be more comfortable and enjoyable if you let them be.

THE WEEK OF THE RULER
CAPRICORN I

The Flagship

This matchup beautifully illustrates the synergistic merging of two very different personalities into a third entity, their relationship, which can be far more successful than either will be alone. Although Capricorn I's are strong people, their authoritarianism does not necessarily make them successful leaders; Pisces-Aries, meanwhile, have the imagination and fantasy to spark new ideas but are often too flaky and undisciplined to take them anywhere. Yet the relationship between these two, particularly if it appears in the commercial or social arenas, has leadership written all over it and may give dynamic direction, guidance and inspiration to a wide range of projects.

Domestic life, however, is a different story. Interpersonally, the authoritarian attitudes of Capricorn I's will be difficult for Pisces-Aries to accept should these two find themselves living together as mates or siblings. And Capricorn I's for their part will be critical of Pisces-Aries' imaginative schemes and at times lackadaisical attitudes. Thus a marriage between these two may have direction and energy yet still fail due to emotional conflicts. It can work out only if Pisces-Aries accept the need of Capricorn I's to call the shots, and if Capricorn I's accept the extreme individuality of the Pisces-Aries personality without attempting to suppress it. Marriage may also work better if the partners lead very separate lives, engaging in many mutually exclusive activities—yet even so, power struggles will inevitably arise at home. On the other hand, since Capricorn I's have such difficulty opening up emotionally, both as lovers and mates, Pisces-Aries energy can prove invaluable in allowing them to discover and express their deepest emotions—particularly those concerned with kindness, love and acceptance. In this sense the relationship may prove curative. And Capricorn I parents (born in the Week of the Ruler) and Pisces-Aries children (born on the Cusp of Rebirth) will find themselves in roles that resemble those of their basic personalities, so this, too, may be a comfortable fit. In the reverse-case scenario, the Capricorn I child may eventually come to assume a more mature and responsible role relative to a quite childlike Pisces-Aries parent.

ADVICE: Share feelings openly. Minimize power struggles. Trust in your relationship's power. Work together efficiently. Keep the faith.

CAPRICORN II

Unspoken Admiration

The focus of this relationship is not just accepting differences but secretly admiring them: the combination's joint watchwords are independence and trust, implying both a tolerance for each partner's expressions of individuality and a loyalty to preserving common bonds. A need to share the joy of achievement and, further, to be appreciated are strong requirements here. A fascination with and openness to the off-beat and oddball side of life is often an underlying theme, perhaps a covert one; an orientation toward metaphysical, spiritual or religious subjects can bring shared experiences at many different levels. True, many Capricorn II's are pragmatic, no-nonsense types, but these hard-boiled characters will be remarkably tolerant of Pisces-Aries quirks and, in fact, may secretly be more interested in unusual subjects than they appear.

It may be difficult for ambitious Pisces-Aries and Capricorn II's to collaborate side by side as co-workers, since both have tendencies toward dominance. The competitive urges that are likely to arise in such a situation will be stimulating but ultimately counterproductive. Capricorn II's, however, tend to compartmentalize their lives into mutually exclusive areas, professional, social and personal, and Pisces-Aries may make fruitful appearances in either of the latter two spheres. They may even relish this kind of division, which may obligate them in one area but free them up in another, giving them the space they need. The combination can work well, then, as a friendship or marriage, and the more intimate the better. Pisces-Aries and Capricorn II's will enjoy relaxing together in the evening, after the trials and tribulations of career, domestic or social activities. They may swap stories or just silently share peace and good feeling—resting, emptying out and recharging before the next onslaught.

Workaholic tendencies in this relationship must not be allowed to get out of hand. These two will often match the week's demanding work with equally demanding play on weekends. There is a certain hardheadedness here, but the relationship does not usually degenerate into knock-down, drag-out fights.

ADVICE: Slow down a bit at work. Keep your ambitions under control. Allow more time for relaxation. Don't be afraid to confront personal problems.

CAPRICORN III

Fostering Talents

This relationship works best when it reveals or nurtures the talents, energies and skills of its participants. Working toward this or a similar type of ideal or service is the best use of the combination's energies. The relationship is likely to grow out of some shared activity rather than through any magnetic attraction, and the pursuit of a common project or hobby can be its main role; acquaintanceship or partnership, then, possibly through group or team endeavors, is more likely than deep friendship. Since self-understanding and a grasp of the relationship's psychological underpinnings are unlikely, this matchup may not be the right one in which to try to resolve emotional problems—in fact, emotional honesty and the sharing of inner feelings may be difficult or impossible here. On the other hand, the combination can prove ideal for relationships such as teacher/student or mentor/acolyte, in which one partner fosters the talents and skills of the other and, in so doing, grows as an individual.

The more intimate kinds of relationships will prove problematic in this combination. Where Pisces-Aries usually hanker after intimacy, Capricorn III's may not need it so much and, on this ground, may find the relationship more comfortable than Pisces-Aries do. They may also find that a need that they do have—the need to be needed—will be rewarded when they lend stability to Pisces-Aries. The latter may be less happy, for in addition to feeling unsatisfied in their desire for intimacy, they may find Capricorn III's too overbearing, serious and severe for their tastes. And Pisces-Aries can be hard-driving and direct: should they find the Capricorn III in their way when they are ramming their way through to a goal, the outcome may be a bit like the irresistible force meeting the immovable object.

Despite their tremendous differences, Capricorn III's and Pisces-Aries can make good spouses if they are determined enough. Pisces-Aries will encourage Capricorn III's in their more imaginative side, making sure they relax and even get silly once in a while; Capricorn III's will adopt a supportive marital role, becoming the financial or practical rock on which Pisces-Aries can always depend. Should these two have children, they can offer a wide spectrum of abilities to their progeny and will also avoid the monolithic stance that so many young people dislike in parents.

ADVICE: Develop more self-awareness. Sharpen psychological skills. Analysis and discussion often yield results. Don't give up.

Lucid Dreaming

This relationship is characterized by a wide palette of emotions, featuring colorful imagination, vivid fantasy and an exciting outlook. There is certainly a sense of kindred spirits here, as if both partners were on the same wavelength. And there is also a strong sexual magnetism, so that the relationship may manifest as a stormy but ecstatic love affair. All in all, this can be a fascinating, albeit tempestuous, relationship—whether as friends, lovers, mates or family members—with rarely a dull moment.

As partners these two can clearly see each other's faults, but initially, at least, they are likely to overlook them, particularly if this is a love relationship. No doubt each partner sees him- or herself in the other, and this projection is not unreasonable, since their unconscious lives may be very similar. Yet the figures they see in each other are also highly idealized, representing the perfection they wish for in themselves. As zodiacal signs, Pisces-Aries combines water and fire, Capricorn-Aquarius earth and air, so that in their relationship with each other these two personalities unite all four elements. Together, this suggests, they can find the wholeness they lack as individuals. The most obvious problem, particularly in love relationships, is that in the urge to meld with each other they may neglect their own self-development, and if they eventually separate they may find themselves playing catch-up, having stopped evolving individually. This tendency toward self-loss in the relationship usually rules out long-standing marital or career partnerships, as one of the duo will eventually need to break away. Pisces-Aries are particularly likely to come to resent the relationship.

As family members, and despite their obvious sympathies and weaknesses for each other, these two can fight like crazy, particularly if they are parent-child pairs. In sibling relationships, however, feelings of rivalry may drop away over the years, allowing quite free and easy feelings to emerge and strong bonds of sympathy and understanding, actually present from the beginning, to come to the fore.

ADVICE: Beware of emotional dependency. Don't idealize so much—you may be fooling yourself. Tone down emotions. Try not to overreact.

The Inquisitive Mind

A quick and perceptive mental orientation characterizes this relationship, and a fascination with intellectual roaming over the most varied areas of human experience. These two will have a great deal to discuss and dissect, whether in the area of sports, history, entertainment or the arts. A love of games, and of activities involving snap decisions and mental gymnastics, can also absorb a lot of the relationship's time; together, these partners may feel enormous relief over finally being free of the slower minds of those who place no value on such activities. Even in their first meeting, these two may engage in an animated conversation, the sheer enjoyment of which augurs well for further communication. Sooner or later, however, the downside of this strong connection will emerge: a tendency toward competitiveness that can lead to arguments and displays of one-upmanship and will ultimately have a destructive effect on the relationship's future.

Nor will such rivalry necessarily be limited to the relationship's internal attitudes and games. Pisces-Aries and Aquarius I's are liable to share friends for whose affection and attention they vie. A youthful marriage between this pair can often feature attractions to others in their social set, and even to marital indiscretions, with concomitant jealousies, possessiveness and displays of temperament. Stability may not be possible in such a relationship, and in fact these two may only be able to live together relatively peacefully in later life.

The desire to dig, reveal and gossip immaturely may further unsettle the relationship, be these two lovers or friends. (This combination is not particularly recommended for colleagues or co-workers, although investigative, scientific, computer or other technical fields—fields that involve the shared unraveling of puzzles—may be exceptions.) On the positive side, however, Pisces-Aries and Aquarius I's are both free spirits and are independent enough not to have to rely on each other for interaction, guidance or support. If one of them must take the lead in establishing guidelines or planning for the future, it will probably be best if that role falls to the Pisces-Aries, who can visualize goals and implement a course of action.

ADVICE: Keep your nose out of other people's business. Try to be more mature. Get serious occasionally. Make more sensible plans for the future.

Life Lessons

An interest in, even a yearning for, the life of ideas, music, art and dance will often appear in this relationship, which may also have a religious streak. Its view of life is often gentle, perhaps idealized, and its core emotional focus is more usually platonic than passionate or sexual. But sensuousness is also present here, in many different forms, with special emphasis on tactile and culinary pleasures. When the relationship is informed by understanding and sympathy, preferably along with some hedonism, the affectionate feelings that typify it may provide the basis for a long-standing marriage.

The relationship will often force both partners to confront certain issues they consider unpleasant. The presence and influence of Pisces-Aries, for instance, will lay bare the difference between what Aquarius II's want (no hassles) and what they need (to confront their dark side); Aquarius II's will probably dislike this aspect of the relationship but may realize that it is essential for their personal and spiritual development. And they, for their part, can help Pisces-Aries by encouraging them not only to recognize defeat but to admit when it has taken place, both in personal matters and at work. Pisces-Aries will not easily acknowledge failure, and their ability to accept this kind of help from Aquarius II's presupposes a great deal of trust.

These two will find it difficult to deal with the more troubled aspects of each other's personality. When reality sets in, or when they are pushed beyond their limit, they may acknowledge that they have made a mistake in partner choice. Thus the relationship may teach them important lessons, not only about closure but about future, more realistic partner choices and the need for openness and vulnerability in matters of love.

As friends, Pisces-Aries and Aquarius II's may share close, siblinglike ties, and their relationship may feature an air of relaxation and enjoyment. It is not usually as effective when they are co-workers or business partners, a context in which they may lack groundedness. On the other hand, their inspiration and motivation to bettering their social standing and job performance is undeniable.

ADVICE: Trouble can be a teacher in disguise. Things can't be pleasant all the time. What you need may not be what you want. Learn how to admit defeat.

Beneath the Surface

Much more inscrutable than either of its partners may realize, this relationship demands introspection and self-understanding if it is to succeed. The enigmatic forces at work in it are difficult not just to fathom but to perceive at all. Rejection may figure prominently at first, whether it be rejection of each other or of other people or events, and the partners will find themselves bemused by its role in their relationship. Over the years, however, rejecting attitudes can change into approving and championing ones. Whether the relationship is a friendship, marriage or love affair, it will work best if both parties are older and more mature.

Aquarius III's may be entranced by Pisces-Aries, seeing them as the embodiment of the direct, purposeful and natural being whom they themselves secretly want to be. The danger here, especially when these two are romantically involved, is that less scrupulous or more selfish Pisces-Aries may take advantage of the vulnerability of Aquarius III's to their charms. With their sharp tongues and their talent for merciless criticism, they can cow less confident Aquarius III's, bending them to their will. Less selfish Pisces-Aries, on the other hand, may prove highly beneficial to unsure Aquarius III's who are looking for direction, and for whom Pisces-Aries can act as guides or teachers. In this respect Pisces-Aries parents can play important roles for their Aquarius III children.

Friendship between these two is favored when there is a basis for the relationship in an objective pursuit, perhaps a shared hobby or pastime. But any close emotional ties that develop out of such a friendship may be disrupted by mutual irritation, the cause of which is sometimes hard to understand. One source of irritation, particularly in marriage, is the attention that Aquarius III's may constantly need from Pisces-Aries—more attention than the Pisces-Aries can comfortably supply. Pisces-Aries need to be free and may come to see Aquarius III neediness as stifling. But should they seek an outlet in an extramarital affair, they may further damage Aquarius III self-esteem. Working relationships, whether as co-workers or partners, are not generally favored, since personal conflicts and resentments will tend to surface here.

ADVICE: Things may not be what they seem. Try to dig deeper and to understand. Introspection will help you to see more clearly. Act fearlessly when sure.

THE CUSP OF REBIRTH
PISCES-ARIES CUSP

A Sheltered Cove

This relationship tends to serve as a haven of peace and security. Although it affords an intimacy that can be satisfying to both partners, however, it can also become a kind of lost world, one predicated on cutting vital ties with society. And should it turn into a buried inner sanctum in this way, it may stagnate, drift or fall apart, particularly if it lacks practical and pragmatic strengths. Building a more structured existence, particularly one firmly linked to the outside world, should be the overriding consideration here. Pisces-Aries is the more likely of the two partners to try to move in this direction, since the Aquarius-Pisces probably tends to fixate more on either abstract or personal concerns.

The matchup may be particularly successful in the area of friendship. Both Pisces-Aries and Aquarius-Pisces are hard-driving career people who need to relax, in close and enjoyable companionship, during their spare time, and a relationship between them may bring them to new heights in this area, since there is a synergy between their aesthetic and intellectual sensibilities. Emotional satisfaction is indicated here by the influence on both partners of watery Pisces, signifying feelings: each party is likely to have antennae out for the other's moods and unconscious wishes. Marriages and love affairs between these two are a bit more problematic and are not particularly recommended. They too can succeed, however, providing a degree of objectivity prevails and the relationship does not succumb to extremes of isolation. In love affairs, Aquarius-Pisces should be encouraged to lower their defenses and rediscover their emotional vulnerabilities; Pisces-Aries can be extremely helpful and understanding in this respect, though they will have to prove themselves in order to gain the trust of Aquarius-Pisces mates, who are likely to be very wary of letting down their guard. Should Pisces-Aries abuse this trust or show that they are unworthy of it, the relationship will most likely end then and there—no second chance will be granted. The knowledge that one big mistake might well be the relationship's last puts the Pisces-Aries partner in a rather precarious position.

ADVICE: Keep windows open to the world. Don't get bogged down. Avoid the tendency to drift. Get a grip on yourself and develop motivation.

Love's Altar

In whatever area the deepest sharing takes place in this relationship, spiritual or religious overtones may be apparent. The feelings involved in a love affair between these two can be pure and idealistic, suggesting that their relationship has become a kind of religion for them, in which their feelings for each other acquire the status of worship. Two dangers may surface here: first, that the partners will share a certain fanaticism; second, that the relationship may be too fragile to survive in a tough world. Cross-currents and complexities are common in this pairing. Fixed, long-term relationships, such as marriage or working together, are not particularly recommended, but friendships and love relationships may flourish if flexibility can be maintained. Particularly in the area of friendship, a loving, strong and deep bond may develop through mutual sympathy and understanding.

Pisces I's may be a tad threatened by direct Pisces-Aries energy, and if more aggressive may clash with it, if more passive may be overwhelmed and play a submissive role. (It is better for them to stand up and assert their prerogatives, since otherwise they risk submerging themselves in the service of the Pisces-Aries. It is even possible that the resulting loss of self-esteem may accelerate, leaving the Pisces-Aries fruitlessly trying to convince the Pisces I of their worth.) They may also find Pisces-Aries themselves overbearing and dictatorial. But they will admire Pisces-Aries' ability to deal with personal or worldly matters and act on them. For their part Pisces-Aries may be deeply touched by the quality of empathy they sense in Pisces I's, even though they may be unable to respond in kind.

The practical side of this matchup is by no means weak: Pisces-Aries have a strong pragmatic side, and Pisces I's may be surprisingly good with money. Yet these practical strengths will have to gel and blossom to be able to balance the relationship's natural fervor and zeal.

ADVICE: Develop practical talents. Maintain individuality. Beware of getting lost. Cultivate enthusiasm for the material world. Stay flexible.

Playful Emulation

This relationship usually focuses on a light, unserious form of competition. Closeness is quite possible here, particularly in the area of friendship, as long as a natural tendency toward one-upmanship can from time to time be put aside, particularly when one of these two is demonstrating his or her artistic, spiritual, intellectual or political expertise. These partners may look as if they're fighting like cats and dogs, but their confrontations are usually playful—albeit still quite competitive. On an emotional level, there is often communication on a common wavelength in this relationship, which can usually encompass an agreement to disagree.

Pisces-Aries favor direct confrontation, but Pisces II's will generally choose not to tackle them head-on. More subtle means can be used to slow them down: Pisces II's who appear to be simply going about their business will often seem mysteriously inviting and will gain the attention and interest of Pisces-Aries on their own terms. Their idiosyncrasies and weirdnesses will be no problem for individualistic Pisces-Aries, who may, however, be troubled and weighed down by their dark, depressive and negative moods. For their part, Pisces II's will often resent having to speed up their normally slow pace in response to Pisces-Aries impatience. The more profound in thought and feeling of these two personalities, they may also complain about what they see as glibness or hastiness in a Pisces-Aries partner. Pisces-Aries, meanwhile, may well give Pisces II's the acceptance they need but, unfortunately, not the stability.

Although Pisces II's may dislike the direct, go-for-it approach of Pisces-Aries, while Pisces-Aries may criticize the directionlessness or laziness of Pisces II's, the unsettled nature of this relationship may work as a stimulating positive impulse. The chances that the relationship will flourish are good when it emerges in a domestic setting that allows meetings at a deep emotional level. Here differences may be put aside in favor of a harmony that will benefit all concerned. Parent-child relationships are favored over sibling pairings, which usually involve friction and competition.

ADVICE: You don't know everything. Put disagreements aside. Search for the truth together. Include rather than exclude. Seek harmony and peace.

Fantastic Experiences

This relationship may give a lot of attention to lifestyle and, indeed, to style in general. There is a strong orientation here toward life experience as opposed to book learning; each partner may have already demonstrated a tendency to live an experience rather than read about it, but together they take this characteristic to and beyond the limit. Pisces-Aries and Pisces III's not only recognize a kindred soul in each other but eventually realize that a common life path, particularly as friends or as lovers, will offer fantastic opportunities. The relationship is usually built less around psychological exploration than around shared activities, which represent its best chance for success.

This combination offers exciting romantic and sexual possibilities. Should deep emotions be stirred up, they may result in a passionate, heartfelt expression of feelings; sensual abandon may also be part of the fulfillment attainable here. If things don't work out, on the other hand, this is often particularly hard on the Pisces III, who generally adopts a more submissive role and may become dependent on the Pisces-Aries. If either partner ends up rejecting the other, usually the Pisces-Aries withdraws from the relationship, sometimes with little warning.

Marriage between these two can be a mistake, particularly if it is preceded by the kind of tumultuous love affair of which this combination is capable. When the fire has cooled down, Pisces-Aries may get restless, dissatisfied or bored with their Pisces III partner's complacency and self-satisfaction. It may be difficult for them to detach themselves from the Pisces III dream world, but they will have to if they are to continue on their own individual and dynamic path. The Pisces III, however, may be left bewildered and confused, and most likely in the grips of a deep depression.

Should a Pisces III and a Pisces-Aries decide to run a business together, join forces as co-workers or just share a mutual interest or hobby for fun, they may achieve a degree of success. The dangers that lie in wait may involve keeping the relationship superficial and being overly concerned with appearances.

Youthful Denial

This relationship is characterized by a love of exploration and by a spontaneous, frank expression that can result in a kind of primal joy. But the impulsive and dynamic energy characteristic of this matchup can also carry both partners far from the stabilizing forces that are required in day-to-day life. The Aries I–Aries I relationship is more likely to manifest in childhood or early adulthood than in the friendships, love affairs, or marriages of maturity, since the kind of understanding that these partners need often becomes harder to achieve as their individual world views become more rigid with advancing age.

Aries I's are generally interested in unusual people who are quite different from themselves. Two Aries I's, then, will rarely choose each other as love partners. They will probably work together well enough, however, as long as they don't need to engage in a lot of personal interaction, and as long as their jobs are straightforward ones in which the tasks they need to accomplish are specific and well-defined. Business partnerships or executive positions are not favored, and it's always better for Aries I's to work together as equals. Things will go more smoothly if both are asked to employ their own specialized expertise and nothing more. Only after years on the same job together will two Aries I's begin to develop anything approaching intimacy.

Family situations involving two Aries I's may work out all right, whether the relationship is of siblings or of parent and child, but not without conflict. Although this relationship manifests some of the strongest child-like energy of any in the year, it also features a stubborn refusal to be treated like a child, whether by partners or by parents. Two Aries I children in the same family may fight constantly if the older one adopts a parental role, treating the younger one in a patronizing or overly protective way. Rebelliousness is bound to surface in such a situation, or when a single Aries I child is coddled or babied by a dominant Aries I mother or father. Generally the greatest conflicts are with the parent of the same sex, the greatest emotional ties with the parent of the opposite sex.

ADVICE: Don't demand too much. Allow time for feelings to grow. Denying immaturity invites suspicion. Let others help you.

Playful Partnership

It is unlikely that the world of deep feelings will figure prominently in this very social relationship, whether its tone is cool or fiery. Love or close friendship may be ruled out here, then, but common bonds relating to a shared hobby, sports activity or other interest may create a certain amount of trust and permanence. The desire to explore nature, particularly if it is out-of-the-way and unusual, may find an outlet in adventuresome activities of all sorts, particularly those involving groups or clubs.

If Aries I and Aries II are siblings, they are likely to fight, since both guard their spaces and their prerogatives closely. Should their aggressive and competitive instincts get out of hand, particularly if they are siblings of the same sex, the family unit may be highly stressed, even torn apart. Relations between either combination of Aries I and Aries II parents and children may remain harmonious as long as the parent does not show tyrannical tendencies, which will invite rebellion. But the relationship does not usually show a well-developed nurturing side, or a love for the everyday chores of homemaking, housekeeping or child-rearing. Marriages are not particularly recommended here, then, unless the spouses can allow each other a good deal of independence to pursue separate careers and spend long periods of time apart.

As far as working together goes, the Aries II Star personality demands attention, and to be at the center of things. This may not sit well with Aries I's, and their egos are likely to clash; if so, the Aries I may withdraw, feeling hurt or neglected. If the relationship manifests at an executive level, however, where these two must share the planning, organization and general leadership of a business or company, they may be able to drive dynamically, shoulder to shoulder, toward common goals.

ADVICE: Cultivate trust and openness. Seek out deeper feelings. Not everything has to be fun. Hard work will yield results.

In the Spotlight

Whether this relationship appears within a family or among a group of friends, it will have to occupy center stage. This suggests not only a need for attention but a desire to lead and give direction to the group's practices and activities. The Aries I–Aries III relationship is well skilled in dealing with people and is therefore usually prized by any group of which it is a part. If it is a family relationship or a friendship, it may be extended into a business endeavor, whether full- or part-time. At work, Aries I's will be willing to collaborate side by side with Aries III's, though it will usually be the Aries III who takes the lead. Friends and family members in this combination are also capable of living together as a domestic unit in everyday adult life.

Some, more-understanding Aries III's can make excellent parents for Aries I's, but others can get carried away with their ideologies, which they may impose rigorously on those around them. This may cause trouble, since Aries I's don't like to be told what to do or to be ruled by ironclad edicts. Other Aries III's, whether parents, friends or siblings, may come to play too great a role in the life of Aries I's, fostering dependencies in them that stunt their individual growth.

A love of physical movement and adventure characterizes this relationship and can lead to exciting projects, with little fear of scaling the heights or plumbing the depths of the natural world. Friendly competition may urge the relationship on to the very limits of physical prowess, and perhaps beyond. Both the romantic and the sexual intensity of a love affair in this combination can be high. Unfortunately, however, expressions of deep emotion or explorations of inner feeling are not usually forthcoming between these two, who may deal with each other mainly on a somewhat superficial level, albeit an exciting one.

ADVICE: Internal exploration is exciting, too. Don't neglect feelings. Be responsible to the emotional needs of others. Meditation can help.

THE CUSP OF POWER
ARIES-TAURUS CUSP

Limited Access

The basis of this matchup is the establishment of firm boundaries, whether between the two partners or, particularly, between the relationship itself and the outside world. The key here is privacy, both for the partners and the relationship; intrusions are resented. This makes it unlikely that emotional doors will be opened too often, so that, despite the presence of a good deal of mutual understanding, it can be hard to get a handle on what is happening within this relationship. Also, romantic rivalries are unwelcome, and jealousies over third parties may prove undermining. Since the pairing is most successful when personal interaction does not have to take place every day, friendships and work relationships usually go better than family, romantic or marital ones.

Diplomatic Aries I's will often defer to Aries-Taurus expertise in a given area but will still want to hold on to the real power in the relationship. The problem here is that Aries-Taurus regard power as their inherent birthright and are usually unwilling to give it up easily. A truce will have to be reached and a spoken or unspoken agreement arrived at concerning what is permitted and what is not. Such an agreement need not involve bad feelings—it can often be built on mutual respect.

Love affairs between these two are not particularly suggested and, if they occur, are usually unsuccessful. Aries-Taurus will often want deeper involvements than independent Aries I's are prepared to give. Marriages are even less favorable, since they usually involve too much personal interaction and a kind of sharing of space that neither partner may welcome. As members of the same family, these two may compete with each other for dominance, and often ultimately come to a stalemate in which they do their best to ignore each other.

As friends, particularly of the same sex, Aries I's and Aries-Taurus may be extremely supportive of each other in times of need, whether financial or emotional. Although lengthy periods may elapse between their visits, appointments or phone calls, they rarely go long without thinking of each other. Such friendships may perfectly suit the needs of both partners, making few demands and leaving them the time they need to attend to their own affairs.

ADVICE: Build personal bridges. Avoid power struggles. Seek common social activities. Beware of cutting yourself off. Open your heart more often.

An Achieving Spirit

This relationship has a strong pioneering spirit. Particularly when the two partners are engaged in a shared project, whether professional or social, their close association and common goals generally ensure success. The key here is careful planning followed by dynamic implementation. Taurus I's may feel threatened by the directness of Aries I energy, but as long as they stay in charge, and their dominant position goes unthreatened, the relationship can work out.

Problems often arise here, however, when Taurus I bosses or parents are confronted with what Aries I employees or children really think of them. They will not want to hear this, but because they are authoritative, and have a tendency to puff up their own importance, Aries I's may be unable to resist the temptation to puncture their balloon. In the family, where Taurus I parents need to be admired and respected unconditionally by their children, an open and honest Aries I child may raise acute problems. Similarly, an adoring Aries I husband or wife who idolizes his or her Taurus I spouse may be a rather rare specimen. The Aries I need to be free, and resentment of being treated like a child, may also prove difficult for overprotective Taurus I's.

Love relationships between these two may suffer from the fact that Taurus I's will not admit to problems in the relationship but will want to keep deriving pleasure from it for as long as possible. Aries I's can enjoy sex and sensuality with Taurus I's up to a point but may also have deep needs in other directions than the purely physical, which Taurus I's may be unable to meet.

Not particularly flexible, this relationship may still feature enough charm to melt the hardest heart, and to overcome stubborn and unyielding attitudes. Particularly if it emerges in the realm of friendship, it can grow strong when each partner's strengths grow and blossom around common interests, particularly those involving sports, adventure and other forms of physical challenge. An element of danger or risk only makes the attraction stronger and the bond deeper.

ADVICE: Honesty is not always the most diplomatic solution. Be realistic about your capabilities. Recognize the need for freedom. Be flexible.

Head and Heart

This relationship combines lively action and critical thought in quite a remarkable way. Potentially a deep and meaningful combination in both love and marriage, it often involves a strong sensual bond, but the attraction is by no means limited to the physical plane. The mental and emotional compatibilities that these two share may lead them to exert their energies over a wide range of activities, from businesses to hobbies to raising a family. Mutual understanding and, also, appreciation are indicated here, and the synergistic melding of the partners' direct and abundant energy, if it is well directed, points the way toward productive and successful endeavors.

Acquaintance-type friendships in this combination may be difficult to maintain, since the sexual pull is so strong here that it may become addictive. Platonic relationships can develop, however, if some bar to greater intimacy, such as one partner's commitment to another person, makes them necessary. If this pair's feelings for each other are unequal, frustrations may result but they can be surmounted through patience and understanding, usually emanating from the Taurus II. Aries I's are quite capable of transgressing the terms of an established relationship with a Taurus II, perhaps eventually leading to a breakup.

Both Aries I's and Taurus II's can be stubborn and unyielding, but this also means that they tend to hang in there and won't give up if the going gets rough. Their marriages, love affairs and business or other working relationships can consequently survive many a storm. Aries I's are generally receptive to Taurus II nurturing qualities but also have an extreme need for independence and an aversion to being babied, which Taurus II's must learn to accept. Yet Aries I's do have a great deal to learn from the Taurus II teacher, particularly in the area of philosophical detachment and emotional understanding. And Taurus II's, for their part, can become more playful, less fixed and repetitive in their behavior, under the influence of Aries I's.

ADVICE: Continue to learn detachment. Keep your energy focused and directed. Work on your frustrations. Feelings need not be opposed to thoughts.

THE WEEK OF THE NATURAL
TAURUS III

Tug-of-War

The chemistry of this combination can be unsettling. Aries I's and Taurus III's have a lot in common—they share an open and natural approach to life—but together they may find stability hard to achieve; their relationship is often pushed and pulled in opposite directions. Power plays between them are not at all uncommon, lending their connection a competitive and at times combative cast.

The combination may not suit a love affair or marriage, then, but there is a mutual appreciation between these two that will allow for a close friendship. It may not be based on emotional sharing and mutual need or acceptance, but these partners will enjoy shared activities, particularly those of an adventuresome, challenging and even dangerous kind. (Aries I's and Taurus III's also make good opponents for each other, stimulating each other as competitors in team sports, or in fitness training.) Aries I's can be quite protective and sympathetic toward those Taurus III's whom others see as troublemakers, or who feel rejected by society in general or by their family in particular.

When these two are siblings, they may compete for parental attention. Aries I's are not submissive by any means, but they are more dutiful than Taurus III's, and jealousies may consequently arise in which Taurus III's view Aries I's as goody-goodies who curry favor to gain love, leaving themselves as bad guys or losers. If this combination manifests as a parent-child relationship, Aries I's will do better in the parental role; they are generally better suited for parenthood than Taurus III's, particularly later in life, when they have sowed some of their wild oats and acquired more self-confidence. Still, this relationship may be plagued by immature impulsiveness in adulthood, especially when anger or resentment unresolved and left over from childhood undercuts its stability and nurturing capabilities.

ADVICE: Put the past behind you. Let go of old grudges and resentments. Power is not the answer. Try to be more accepting and kind. Pull together.

THE CUSP OF ENERGY

Psychological Motivation

This relationship can be dramatic, yet it also tends to be introspective and analytical, with its partners discussing psychological issues in an objective way. Taurus-Geminis are more comfortable with this approach than Aries I's are, but it will in most cases be the self-awareness of the Aries I's that will blossom here, less through the direct influence or observations of their partner than through the spirit of openness that prevails in the relationship. Should psychological investigation become blocked, the tremendous energy and vision of this matchup can become scattered or bottled up inside. Tendencies to put things off, to deny the truth or to brood over past injustices must be dealt with and fought, for they will undermine more positive factors such as desire, ambition, self-esteem or hopefulness.

The psychological emphasis notwithstanding, close friendships, love affairs and marriages are unlikely with this relationship; these two often don't suit each other emotionally or sexually, nor is it easy for them to share interests. They can give each other good advice but are usually too independent and ornery to want to accommodate each other in personal relationships, and neither has a big talent for compromise. At work, on the other hand, Taurus-Geminis may prove inspiring and stimulating to Aries I's, particularly as colleagues on the same level. In fact, a relationship between these two is highly favored in the workplace, where Taurus-Gemini ideas and Aries I straightforwardness will usually combine effectively, Taurus-Gemini compulsiveness will usually have a positive effect on the Aries I tendency to procrastinate, and Aries I's will help to keep Taurus-Geminis attentive to the job at hand, preventing their interest from wandering.

There is, however, a major problem that will have to be solved if the relationship is to succeed at work, and also in the family: Aries I's have a need and talent for group involvement, while Taurus-Geminis have an aversion to it and usually prefer to work alone. The relationship may be able to overcome this roadblock through its psychological strengths, as the partners discuss this tension between them and gain insight into it.

ADVICE: Work on compromise. Cultivate social activities. Don't be so free with advice. Allow others their realizations. Show your emotions more openly.

Guardians of the Downtrodden

The emphasis in this combination is on action. Excitement is essential if a slump in the relationship is to be avoided, and excitement will usually reawaken dormant interests and slumbering energies. Both of these partners usually need to escape into life experiences rather than away from them, and both need a "twin" with whom to share such experiences. The importance that the relationship gives to what may seem to be external issues, particularly in matters of technique and quality, may lead others to see it as superficial and not terribly serious. Such judgments may ignore the fact that worldly interests do not necessarily preclude soulfulness or spirituality.

Aries I's have the perfect blend of caution and courage to allow Gemini I's to have a good time and forget their troubles. In a Gemini I–Aries I friendship, no matter what the age difference, Aries I's find themselves treated as equals—a vitally important requirement for them. Gemini I's, for their part, cannot stand phoniness in any form and will find their Aries I partner unlikely to dissimulate.

Whether as friends, mates or lovers, Gemini I's and Aries I's in combination must be careful not to fall afoul of society or of the law. An extreme hankering for freedom and an uncompromising ethical stance may manifest as rebellion against any condition perceived as unjust or unfair. The result may be that outsiders view this couple as antisocial or even, in extreme cases, sociopathic, yet the relationship tends to work to protect the downtrodden and the weak. When spurred on to action by noble moral sentiments, this duo can have an awesome power.

ADVICE: Don't be so moral or condemning. Come down off your white horse. Crusading isn't always appreciated. Cultivate spirituality. Meditate.

The Reflecting Pool

This relationship, like a mirror, acts as a projection of deep and secret desires, particularly when it is romantic. While on the face of things it seems to be based on intense physical attraction, it is actually more about wish-fulfillment: through each other, these partners feel they can attain their most fervent desires, as if they stood by a magical lake in whose murky depths they could find all of their wishes, provided they chose to dive into its darkness. Though fascinating, then, this relationship also has a quality of blindness, like love itself. Even so, it may outlast many others in which reality has a more dominant, more irritating role.

Through falling in love with each other, both of these personalities can fulfill a secret wish. Aries I's, for example, often want to be brilliant conversationalists who can win others over with compelling arguments, Gemini II's to be action-oriented individuals who succeed by daring to fail; as partners, each of these two can be these things for the other. Areas outside romantic love, including marriage, are less suitable to this combination. Gemini II's have a tremendous need to be understood and may barrage a partner with a constant flow of words and ideas; this will only make Aries I's nervous and confused. Even if Gemini II's are articulate and skillful in expressing themselves, they will probably make Aries I's yearn for peace and quiet. In day-to-day living, then, this matchup may deprive Aries I's of one of their firmest requirements in any relationship—that they can withdraw to a quiet place when they need to be alone. Meanwhile, Gemini II's may view their attempts to pull back as rejection and may immediately feel judged and misunderstood. Situations where these two must see each other daily, then, including the family, marriage and work, often don't work out.

One characteristic of the relationship, in any area, is that debate, argument and discussion figure prominently in it, pleasing Gemini II's but frustrating Aries I's, who are generally more interested in doing than in talking. After an initial attraction, furthermore, friendship may not be possible here, since Aries I's will quickly enough begin to suspect that many Gemini II claims or ideas are a bit far-fetched.

ADVICE: Be careful what you wish for. Beware of isolation. Keep your eyes open. Find out what's yours. Physical attraction isn't everything.

Perilous Awakenings

There is a jarring, explosive quality in this relationship—a longing to reach for the stars can translate into a taste for daredevil exploits. The combination can consequently prove unsettling to any partner with conservative or pragmatic attitudes. Any romantic feelings that manifest here will be hard to control, making love affairs between these two extremely exciting and dangerous, particularly if one or both of the partners is already married or in an established relationship. Despite the upset this relationship can cause, it also has the capacity to teach its participants something of great value.

Exacerbating the relationship's radical nature is the fact that Aries I's have a particular tendency to be transgressive in matters of the heart, while Gemini III's can throw caution to the winds when prompted by their more tumultuous feelings. These two may enter into a torrid, perhaps destructive love affair, after which it is unlikely that they will form a permanent relationship. Unfortunately, it may in retrospect seem that one of the two has served mainly as the necessary vehicle or support to help the other bring a preexisting, established relationship to a close. As friends, Aries I's and Gemini III's risk the firestorm of emotions, positive or negative, into which their relationship can burst at any time. As a result, they never feel completely comfortable with each other, and lack the easy intimacy required for longevity. The relationship does best, then, in objective pursuits, with the partners being co-workers or colleagues who keep an eye on a common goal.

In families and marriages, the relationship characteristically oscillates in mood from highly constructive to highly destructive. Things may go well for weeks or months, then gradually start a downward slide, punctuated by emotional outbursts. Over the years, the combination's stormy side will bring the partners closer together in a mutual dependency after each healing takes place but will also make them increasingly wary of being open and trusting with each other. Both emotional honesty and a willingness to work on the relationship will be crucial to guaranteeing its continuation.

ADVICE: Respect others' relationships. Justify openness and trust. Even out your emotions. Avoid mood swings. Beware of destructiveness.

Trusting Tranquillity

The most crucial area in the pairing of Aries I and Gemini-Cancer is that of trust, for neither partner easily admits others to his or her private inner world. This trust, along with an ability to learn and develop together, may be slow to build, but if not harmed, will eventually emerge as the relationship's focus and, indeed, may prove the backbone of a long-standing friendship, marriage or love affair. And no matter how deep it runs, the connection between these two is vulnerable to being irreparably broken if infidelity or betrayal occurs on even one occasion. Forgiveness, then, is not characteristic of this relationship.

Gemini-Cancers often have a soothing effect on the Aries I personality. Aries I's have a stressed-out side and can push themselves too hard and too fast; a Gemini-Cancer energy waiting at home may allow them to relax in domestic tranquillity. This is not to say that these two always have a calming influence on each other, but in general the more intuitive side of Aries I's allows them to understand the sensitivity of Gemini-Cancers, while the emotional sensibility of Gemini-Cancers grants a sympathy with Aries I problems.

Should a friendship between these two emerge, a decision may have to be faced as to whether to allow it to go further. If limits are set (whether because one of the partners wants to avoid the uncharted waters of romantic or sexual involvement or because one partner already has a mate or lover whose jealousy must be appeased), they may take the form of simply restricting contact with each other. Most often such a decision will be hard to make: the understanding that can slowly develop between Aries I's and Gemini-Cancers is subtle and magical, and this relationship can only be scaled back with great difficulty and pain.

Much between these two remains unspoken, whether they are lovers or friends. As family members, Aries I's and Gemini-Cancers may be extremely close—so close, in fact, that their relationship may carry the danger of emotionally or, more rarely, physically incestuous overtones. In all connections between these two, objectivity may prove both a crying need and, alas, an impossible goal.

ADVICE: Keep your head clear. Make every effort to open up. Try to be more forgiving and understanding. Clarifying the rules early may spare pain later.

Feeling Natural

This relationship is characterized by simple, direct kinds of expression and gives emotions a high priority. This can be both good and bad: while the partners will be able to vent their feelings and be themselves comfortably and easily, too much directness can also cause an overstepping of boundaries, sometimes with calamitous results. Eventually this combination can lead to a respect for privacy, an increased sensitivity and the realization that some subjects are best left untouched. Once this happens, more extreme forms of individual expression can be accepted.

Aries I's and Cancer I's should feel comfortable with each other, since both favor direct expression. Cancer I's, however, tend to see feelings as their personal domain and can try to appropriate not only people but their emotions; Aries I's will not feel comfortable with such claims, which they may experience as threatening their need for privacy. And once Aries I's feel their freedom at risk, they're gone. Consequently, Cancer I's may wake up one morning to find that they have gone too far. This can prove a conflict in this relationship.

Interpersonal relations between these two, whether marriages, friendships or family connections, can only succeed if the Cancer I knows when to stop probing the heart and psyche of the Aries I. The Aries I may feel comfortable with the Cancer I's attention up to a point, but beyond that point will post more and more warning signs. Another part of the same problem appears when Aries I's, although they may feel great fondness for Cancer I's, become increasingly wary of expressing their feelings, fearing that they are flashing a green light. Cancer I's will find this very hard to deal with, since a relationship's emotional openness is very important to them.

Should strong natural feeling prevail, the dynamic aspects of Aries I's may be welcome in business ventures, and can meld well with the money sense and the protective and defensive instincts of Cancer I's. At work, an Aries I on offense and a Cancer I on defense together offer the basis of an effective all-around team. Enterprises can only succeed, however, if each party feels free enough in the relationship to express his or her individual point of view.

ADVICE: Learn to be attentive without smothering. Back off and leave things alone. Retain your individuality—a relationship should not demand all.

THE WEEK OF THE UNCONVENTIONAL
CANCER II

Behind the Mask

The keynote to this relationship is an attraction to the unusual and the new—to quirks, peculiarities and revolutionary traits. That the relationship will be interested in somewhat rebellious or radical trends, whether in clothing, body ornament, interior decorating, dancing or music, is not particularly surprising: this couple itself has a certain charming quirkiness. It also has strength, and although it has a taste for the offbeat, it rests on a bedrock of stability. Sensing this, outsiders involved with the partners in this relationship will enjoy its unusualness all the more. In fact, this team is likely to be popular and in demand. As such, it can be a real force of change.

The lifestyle these two choose may well prove a basis for living together or marriage. Since many Aries I's are rather interesting and extreme types anyway, there is a reasonable chance that Cancer II's will find them intriguing, but the chemistry must be right, and the Aries I must be open to the kind of domestic security and nurturing qualities that the Cancer II can offer. Although extremely independent, Aries I's often need some kind of family life, and Cancer II's may be able to fill this need in a way that does not significantly limit their freedom.

Cancer II's, too, can be unusual, even bizarre personalities, but they often hide behind a facade of normality or take an everyday job. Similarly, Aries I's often present an outward persona (active, aggressive) that is at odds with their real inner state (quiet, even withdrawn). A relationship that allows these two to recognize each other as soulmates behind the masks they show the world may be well suited to both love affairs and marriages.

The problems that occur in this relationship usually arise in the area of misunderstanding: Cancer II's may mistakenly interpret Aries I independence as disinterest, and Aries I's may take the preoccupation of Cancer II's with their interior fantasy life as rejection. Sharing domestic responsibilities and having children, however, may cement the combination.

ADVICE: Ordinary things can be interesting too. Don't make such a point of being different. Cultivate true individuality. Beware of trendiness.

THE WEEK OF THE PERSUADER

Conversational Interchange

Independence and boundaries are top priorities here. The relationship focuses on communication, but communication mainly through the spoken word: interactions often elude the physical and take place via telephone, fax or e-mail, with face-to-face meetings often restricted to certain convenient times and places. Generally speaking, this duo's choices are conscious and thought out, motivated more by intention and desire than by need. Even so, the relationship often features considerable emotional conflicts, which are likely to cause problems when it appears in the realms of family, love or marriage. Over the years, these frustrations and tensions may lead to greater understanding and ultimately to increased closeness, but the road to such acceptance may be long and rocky.

A romantic or sexual chemistry between these two is often missing, but Aries I's and Cancer III's may well be able to work together effectively, particularly as co-workers in a team involved in media endeavors. Both Cancer III's and Aries I's are ambitious, and together they may prove too aggressive in struggling to rise to the top; they must take care not to be threatening to other people or groups, who may be jealous or competitive and may work to counteract their aspirations. Power struggles within the relationship must also be monitored carefully, lest individual drives undermine the common cause.

Because of this matchup's strong mental orientation, more emotional Cancer III's and intuitive Aries I's will not always feel comfortable with each other. This relationship deemphasizes feelings and impulses. On the other hand, realistic and moneywise Cancer III's will make important contributions to the dependability and security of this duo, while Aries I's will often furnish drive and initiative. Although Cancer III's will have difficulty getting Aries I's to open up and be honest, and Aries I's will occasionally feel smothered or manipulated by Cancer III's, these two will find a working rhythm, no matter how strange or unconventional.

ADVICE: Keep ambitions under control. Find ways to avoid frustration. Learn to relax and accept. Acknowledge unconscious drives and motivations.

Alleviating Distress

There is a liberating quality to this relationship, a sense of being able to breathe, which can make this an ecstatic combination. Sympathy and protective instincts may blossom here, as well as moral fervor and passion. The relationship will find itself championing the oppressed and will not hesitate to fly in the face of tradition or custom in giving love and support to a needy partner in distress. It is not unusual, then, for it to emerge at a time when one or the other of the partners is involved in a troubled or failing love affair or marriage, and when it can provide the freedom and safety that both individuals seek. At such a time, this relationship can allow Aries I's to show the very best, heroic qualities they have to offer, even while they also extend understanding to the third party involved. For the Cancer-Leo, meanwhile, it is the covertness and the secret, unpredictable and exciting nature of such a liaison that usually provide the magic.

In love affairs not involving a third party, the attraction between these two may be less intense: Aries I openness often does not carry a highly charged enough emotional admixture to hold Cancer-Leo interest. Should Cancer-Leos fall in love with Aries I's, however, they may be challenged in holding on to them, since Aries I's can feel threatened and hemmed in by their aggressive stance. Cancer-Leos also demand a lot of understanding, which Aries I's may lack. In marital or other living situations, Aries I impulsiveness and Cancer-Leo instability do not bode well for permanence or longevity, particularly as their initial idealization of each other falls away.

The relationship's swirling energies can gel at work. These two don't usually stick to mundane activities but pursue projects involving adventure and travel, challenge and danger, often in the executive worlds of corporate finance, investment or advertising. Cancer-Leos' tendency to excess, and their penchant for wide mood swings, will need to be tempered and moderated by Aries I's, who may be gratified to be the more responsible and dependable ones.

ADVICE: Try not to be so moral and judgmental. See the other person's point of view. Beware the destructiveness of covert activities. Stay balanced.

THE WEEK OF AUTHORITY
LEO I

Free-for-All

The underlying themes of this combination are likely to be freedom and independence of action. It is a relationship that constantly needs to move forward, change and grow—stagnation is a particular threat to this pairing. The partners will generally get along and understand each other well (because of their easy, trine relationship—120° apart in the zodiac—and because both Aries and Leo are fire signs), but the flame of their relationship will periodically flare up and burn out of control; instability and impermanence are a hallmark here. These conflicts don't actually reflect reality so much as the relationship's resistance to boredom. Even so, arguments can take on a life of their own, snowballing into destructiveness.

Passionate relationships between these two are likely to burn brightly but may quickly be extinguished once the fuel is used up. Furthermore, the emphasis on freedom of action here is likely to arouse jealousies and possessiveness, even should both partners really want to be free to get involved with others. Friendship is probably a better bet for Aries I's and Leo I's, as long as they can maintain objectivity and avoid conflict. The fact that they usually share a mutual understanding does not guarantee that they won't disagree, and over time this can grind down even the firmest bedrock of sympathy. In work, love and family matters, the relationship can become a battlefield of rivalries—for a job, for the affections of a third party, for the attentions of a parent. Winning is a high priority, but the Leo I usually has the upper hand; the Aries I may lack the necessary patience, or the love of tough infighting, that will be necessary to prevail here.

The relationship between a Leo I parent and an Aries I child may be particularly rocky, since it will fix both of them in roles surprisingly similar to the qualities of their individual characters, thus reinforcing dominant and childlike tendencies, respectively. Perhaps the best possibility for these two is as siblings, particularly of the opposite sex; here a sympathetic emotional bond can develop over the years. As brother and sister, this pair can replace competitive tendencies with mutual admiration and fondness, which will grow as the years go by.

ADVICE: Don't pretend to be more free than you really are. Admit to dependencies. Beware of double standards. Avoid fixed role-patterns. Lessen conflicts.

August 3–10

THE WEEK OF BALANCED STRENGTH
LEO II

One of a Kind

This relationship will often feature an original, even unique outlook on life. Ethics and idealism are the order of the day; this is a moral, courageous and loyal pair. Aries I's and Leo II's are well suited for domestic life, whether they are married or living together. They also share a great many positive qualities, which blend harmoniously in this relationship and can be taken to the limit. The matchup is also characterized by a need for privacy, with both partners demanding honesty from each other in their everyday interactions. Acting naturally, and being comfortable with assigned roles, these two mutually accept each other and, together, are at ease with themselves. There is an intense dislike in this matchup for pretension and disingenuousness.

On the other hand, the relationship may not be completely stable, depending on the ability of the Leo II to stay emotionally balanced. Leo II's have strong passions that can run out of hand, and career problems and failures can bring out a streak of masochism in them that can lead to serious depressions. Unfortunately, Aries I's may not be particularly good at bolstering a Leo II's sagging self-image. Neither Aries I's nor Leo II's are comfortable with strong expressions of feeling, and the relationship may consequently show signs of repression, particularly in times of stress. Periodic outbursts of anger may bring violent confrontations but, more characteristically, will result in expressions of bewilderment, frustration or helplessness.

In the family sphere, these two may for the most part be accepting and tolerant of each other, particularly as siblings. A natural amount of competitiveness will arise, of course, while they are growing up, but they can derive great satisfaction from shared activities involving hobbies, sports or pets.

Others may not like or understand the Aries I–Leo II relationship, particularly in its somewhat wild and wacky tastes and its idiosyncratic ideas or lifestyle. So relaxed are the attitudes here that the relationship may be ineffective in the workplace, lacking the push to advance a joint project.

ADVICE: Beware of self-satisfaction and smugness. Try a bit harder. Don't be too moral or judgmental. Express feelings.

LEO III

The Unknown Tongue

In order for this relationship even to get off the ground, a common basis of communication will have to be created. But the relationship has a natural tendency to find a unique means of dialogue that will further understanding and help to transcend the conflicting personality elements of its two willful partners. The relationship can be put first, and more selfish or individualistic desires can be abandoned, if somewhat unusual avenues of communication are opened up, avenues that Aries I's and Leo III's may never have explored with earlier partners.

These two can share a powerfully effective working relationship, with the Leo III taking the lead and the Aries I applying prodigious energy to the job at hand. The Leo III is more likely to be found in an executive or managerial role, and the success of this partnership will depend on the Aries I's ability to accept him or her as an employer or boss. If intelligently directed toward a common goal, this duo's fused intuitive energies can sweep the field of opposition and surmount the most difficult technical or financial barriers. Should personal conflicts arise between these fiery types, however, communication breakdown may threaten an entire project's success.

For the most part, the relationship does not do well as a marriage, for destructive power struggles are likely to emerge when passions are aroused between these two. A love affair can bring the partners to heights of sexual excitement and fulfillment yet is unlikely to be long-lasting, since Leo III's, with their deep and often tumultuous feelings, will probably disturb the cool and detachment that Aries I's need if they are to stay on an even keel. In simple terms, Aries I's may ultimately find Leo III emotional energy too much to handle.

In the sibling or parent-child relationship, entrenched confrontational and combative stances are likely to be assumed, particularly if a Leo III parent or older sibling of the same sex sternly attempts to crush the spontaneity or individuality of an Aries I. A further danger appears when Aries I children idolize Leo III parents, becoming blind to their faults and unduly dependent on them.

ADVICE: Always keep the lines of communication open. Beware of selfishness. Learn to sacrifice and to share. Minimize power struggles. Remember to be kind.

Confidential Projects

This relationship is characterized by an ability to originate large ideas or big projects, or at least to make expansive plans. But it tends to do so away from the watchful eyes of the world—this pair will often keep their plans to themselves, even as they slowly actualize their dreams. Their ability to think on a large scale is a real plus, but their need to keep their thinking secret can almost become pathological; this pairing is not served by the smoke screens it erects to maintain privacy.

Although Aries I's are much the more direct of this pair, their openness often belies a hidden side, not unlike Leo-Virgo secretiveness. And although Leo-Virgos usually share and reveal their secrets in the end, Aries I's rarely or perhaps never do so. Sharing their secrets with each other creates a bond of trust between these two personalities, and is often the way they begin to build a private life together, one in which they discuss their innermost dreams, goals and the other personal areas they tend to hide.

Aries I's who get involved with Leo-Virgos may have gotten in over their heads, particularly in emotional and romantic relationships. Leo-Virgos demand a lot of understanding, and Aries I's may not have the stamina or the interest to contend with their complex moods and feelings. Strong physical attraction may be unusual for this combination; sexuality is unlikely to be what draws these two to each other.

Despite the joys of working on a big family project together, a marriage between these two can undergo a severe crisis when fundamental personality differences emerge, perhaps months or even years after the wedding. Aries I's like their freedom and may feel trapped and hemmed in by emotional ties to Leo-Virgos, particularly as spouses. In the family sphere, particularly between siblings of the opposite sex, a close bond may develop in which Aries I dynamism and outgoing energy catalyzes Leo-Virgo thoughtfulness, to the benefit of all concerned.

Seeking New Frontiers

This relationship will favor adventurous and challenging projects—anything that causes this pair to seek out a variety of experience, or the answers to a variety of questions. The differences between these two personalities, however, are such that the relationship may become wholly involved in seeking out a basis of understanding between them—an effort that may not receive much reward.

These partners have completely different approaches to life, with Aries I's acting on their intuition and Virgo I's tending to be more structured and logical. Faced with an upcoming event or challenge, Virgo I's tend to plan things out to the last detail, whereas Aries I's tend to fly by the seat of their pants. Yet these two can meld beautifully as co-workers, fighting the good fight or rolling back new frontiers, side by side. They often focus on objective pursuits of a technical, scientific or financial bent rather than on people-oriented projects.

In more intimate settings, the energies of Aries I's and Virgo I's can clash. Both love and marriage may be undermined by the Virgo I's emotional problems and by the Aries I's inability to deal with them. When a Virgo I sinks into a depression (perhaps caused by feeling rejected, unloved or ignored by an Aries I), there may be little that either party can constructively do. The nervous instability of a Virgo I can unsettle the positive, breezy attitudes of an Aries I, leaving both partners a bit unsteady and lacking the confidence to cope with any crisis that may arise. Similarly, friendships between these two are likely to demand an emotional investment that neither party may be prepared to make. The relationship usually lacks either sexual or financial reward.

As parents, Virgo I's can provide the kind of structure in everyday living that allows Aries I's to bloom and to express their most creative side. An Aries I parent may also benefit from having a Virgo I child who brings order to family life (although probably not the deep understanding needed in the emotional sphere, even as the child grows older).

ADVICE: Keep seeking new challenges. Don't give up. Keep emotions under control. Don't worry so much. Beware of depressions. Try to relax.

Take It or Leave It

Aries I's and Virgo II's may be extremely different, but they have at least three things in common: first, they both hate being analyzed; second, they believe they can work out their problems without anyone else's help; and third, they are fiercely individualistic. Their relationship synergistically drives these traits to an extreme. As a partnership, these two believe in making no excuses whatsoever for their thoughts, appearance or actions. Other people can simply take them or leave them.

Before meeting each other, both of these two may have had difficulty finding a partner they could live with, but together they often have a special chemistry. In fact, Aries I's and Virgo II's make excellent spouses, often marrying after an immediate physical attraction and an exciting love affair. All of the marital joys may be theirs, including home and children. Things don't always go easily for these high-strung individualists, and frequent disagreements and arguments dot the landscape of their relationship. Yet they have the ability to forgive and make up, and also to be there for each other in times of need.

Aries I's and Virgo II's get along less well as friends, when they often have an unsettling effect on each other. Competition over a mutual friend or lover may threaten or destroy the relationship. Virgo II moral attitudes can make Aries I's decidedly uncomfortable, particularly if directed against them in a disapproving and critical way. And Aries I's will sometimes appear impulsive or thoughtless to Virgo II's, who are usually much more discriminating and careful.

As co-workers or family members, these two can really get on each other's nerves. Their approaches to many problems are diametrically opposed and may generate frictions that are counterproductive to the efforts of the group. Although others may find the gyrations of this relationship entertaining, sooner or later the humor of the situation wears thin. One combination that can work out, however, is a boss-employee relationship with the Virgo II as the boss: Virgo II's generally know what they want, and Aries I's can usually deliver.

ADVICE: Ease your moral stance a bit. Beware of impulsiveness. Don't push to the limit so much—forgiveness may not always be granted.

Unacknowledged Magic

This is a relationship in which the partners' similarities are slow to be recognized: these two are very different, to the extent that they make a surprising pair. Yet even if it goes somewhat unnoticed, an ineffable magic surfaces periodically in their combination. An unspoken affection in the relationship betokens a personal loyalty that will surmount temporary disagreements or power struggles. Willfulness and courage manifest strongly here, accompanied by a love of truth and a dislike of phoniness and pretension. Keeping emotions under control is a strong requirement for this combination.

Aries I's often find Virgo III's unnecessarily theatrical, and also superior—with an Aries I, Virgo III's always seem to think they know best. For Virgo III's, meanwhile, Aries I's may appear uptight. But these attitudes may only be projections of each partner's frailties, or reactions when one of them feels threatened by the other. Family relationships are not favored for this combination, particularly brother-sister or father-daughter pairs. Both of these personalities can be pretty dominant types, the kinds of people who don't have to be loud to be heard, in almost any situation. Both are capable of hurling barbs with telling effect, and when these are directed at each other, they may escalate into an out-of-control conflict. And yet, again, a strange kind of magnetism between these two often wins out, and results in acceptance and increased respect. In friendships, these two are much too direct and outspoken about their likes and dislikes to allow their partner much rest. Their relationship may be characterized by a kind of kidding, bantering or bickering. With scarcely a dull moment, they will sharpen their wits on each other, often bringing out both the best and the worst in each other's characters. People meeting them for the first time may even take them as enemies or at least adversaries, but their insults are usually meant affectionately.

Sexual or romantic relations between these two will run the gamut between extremes of love and hate. Strong attractions and repulsions are characteristic of the pair, and should they be lucky or unlucky enough to have a brief fling and breakup, they will rarely come back for a second helping.

ADVICE: Acknowledge what you have in common. Keep your bantering under control. Recognize magical moments. Stress the positive. Even out emotions.

THE CUSP OF BEAUTY

Aesthetic Mastery

This relationship may focus on a shared enthusiasm for art, design, music or literature, areas in which it will want to achieve mastery or technical proficiency. It may also achieve great success, since it has an ability to predict trends. Both Aries I's and Virgo-Libras are impressed with fine appearance and aesthetic taste, but their combination often drives such interests to the limit.

This relationship can be satisfying and mutually rewarding as long as feelings are kept on a more platonic, less intimate plane. Warning lights should go off, however, when Aries I's find themselves dazzled by Virgo-Libras. Should the feeling be mutual, the relationship may start off like a house on fire; but after passions have cooled down, problems will usually arise, particularly if an unpretentious Aries I suspects that he or she has become involved with a snob. Aries I's dislike pretense of any kind and may begin to withdraw if they think their partners are not what they seem to be on the surface, no matter how attractive that surface is. Virgo-Libras, on the other hand, are often irritated by Aries I moodiness, impetuosity and emotional problems. As far as marriage goes, then, the attraction these two initially feel for each other is unlikely to translate into the deep feelings necessary for a long-standing involvement. Should Aries I's and Virgo-Libras marry before they really know each other, the effects can be disastrous when they discover they really have little in common other than a shared aesthetic, and that even less holds them together. Financial obligations and property may be particularly painful issues at such times of crisis.

In sibling and parent-child pairs, this relationship can be highly empathic and supportive. Aries I's are protective of Virgo-Libra vulnerabilities, and Virgo-Libras can have a calming effect on the frenetic energies of Aries I's, particularly by making their domestic surroundings more comfortable and aesthetically satisfying.

ADVICE: Dig a little deeper. Explore and understand emotions more fully. Attend to practical matters. Accept imperfection.

LIBRA I

The Swirling Vortex

Aries I and Libra I are opposites in the zodiac, and their opposition can immediately translate into conflict, not only within the relationship but also outside it: together, these two can adopt an extremely aggressive stance toward the world. This tendency can best be harnessed if the relationship is geared to a cause; it can provide, for example, no small amount of success in business. Furthermore, as is often the case, conflict and passion are not far apart here, and this pairing can often include a magnetic physical attraction. In short, Aries I (fire) and Libra I (air) have a catalytic effect on each other. Such explosiveness does not usually augur well for marital and work relationships, where stability is so important over the long haul. A particular bone of contention will be the Aries I dislike of criticism; they are natural, spontaneous creatures who cannot handle constant scrutiny and judgment. Libra I's, meanwhile, often can't help being critical. They also try to keep their emotions under control at all costs, and will be disturbed by the honest emotional expressions and periodic spontaneous outbursts of an Aries I. In this respect they may be unconsciously reacting against traits that they secretly desire, since in some ways Aries I's are living models for what Libra I's most need to cultivate—the frank, open approach to the world that will allow them a release of their inner tensions and insecurities.

As the relationship develops and feelings emerge, Libra I's will be able to see what they view as Aries I problems more clearly, and will want to get in there and fix what they perceive as wrong. This Aries I's will not be able to abide. But Aries I's may make mistakes too, in passing moral judgment on what they see as incorrect behavior on the part of Libra I's. Thus the relationship will become a vortex of swirling feelings, both positive and negative. As siblings, these two may forever be fighting, particularly if they are of the same sex.

As friends, this duo craves action and excitement, and the relationship may be structured around sports, drama, adventure or social groups or clubs. The combination's saturation point for socializing is low, however—these two will often find it necessary to withdraw and find a quiet place.

ADVICE: Allow for differences. Withhold undue criticism. Keep in contact with the world. Question your values. Don't assume you're infallible.

THE WEEK OF SOCIETY
LIBRA II

Empathic Comrades

This combination offers a good example of how a relationship can create synergies. When faced with problems or challenges, for example, Aries I's will act more from instinct, while more mental Libra II's will hang back a bit; yet this combination's greatest strengths are neither instinct nor thought but emotion, feeling and empathy. In the long run, the relationship will give each partner the sensitivity to know and understand the other's feelings.

Aries I outspokenness and Libra II reflectiveness may occasionally conflict, yet each has much to learn from the other. Often procrastinators, Libra II's may admire the ability of Aries I's to make up their mind and act without endless rumination; headstrong Aries I's, for their part, may learn from Libra II's how to be less rash and to use their common sense. Given the differences in each party's orientation, this combination would not traditionally be recommended for love affairs, but actually things can work out. The crucial factor will be how strong physical attraction is; that both parties to the relationship enjoy having fun is a big plus. Marriages, on the other hand, may work out very nicely even if sexual or sensuous considerations are downplayed. Comradeship, affection, acceptance—all of these grow stronger in Aries I–Libra II marriages as the years go by. A truly unselfish love is possible between these two, assuming that the Aries I is not overly egotistical and does not ignore Libra II needs. Libra II's, meanwhile, must respect the Aries I need for independence, yet without being masochistic and losing self-respect.

As family members, Aries I's can help protect Libra II's from being at the mercy of their dark side. Aries I's bring not only fun-loving qualities to the sibling or parent-child relationship but also understanding; they know what it is to be beset by moodiness themselves and can usually handle it better in others than deal with their own demons.

ADVICE: Keep it light. Physical attraction is not the most important thing. Balance freedom and responsibility. Don't compare yourself to others.

Determined Struggle

Hard-headed determination and a struggle for power provide the focus for this combination. As a long-standing relationship, particularly at work or as a marriage, it is often plagued by internal dissension, which can be damaging to colleagues or to children. If this relationship is to work out, responsibilities and authority must be carefully delineated, and a truce must be reached as to who is boss. It will also be necessary to work hard on developing mutually kind and understanding attitudes.

Love affairs in this combination can be complex and strongly unrealistic, particularly on the part of the Aries I, whose idealism and fixed ideas can get in the way of seeing things as they really are. This will often lead to an inability to let the relationship go, even once it has stagnated or moved downhill. Closure may also be impaired or prevented by Aries I loyalty and Libra III indecision. These two personalities can easily find themselves locked in an ongoing struggle, in which the Aries I will be overtly aggressive while the Libra III is more passive-aggressive.

There is a positive side: neither Aries I's nor Libra III's are particularly domestic types, and they will love to go out together and do fun things as friends. The theatrical side of an Aries I can blossom in the company of a Libra III. The friendship may also have a romantic quality, even if it lacks a physical or sexual component, which may in fact detract from it. Its alchemy involves a strange blend of realism and fantasy, in which even the most mundane topics and experiences can be exalted. All financial arrangements should be discussed and finalized before any action is taken.

The hard-driving, ambitious nature of this combination does not make parent-child or sibling combinations any easier. There is usually competition between these two if they are family members, with a possibility of angry or violent confrontations.

ADVICE: Work on respect and kindness. The one giving the orders isn't always the one who's boss. Avoid power struggles. Have fun together. Define roles well.

Unusual Tastes

This relationship may well feature an unconventional lifestyle but is nevertheless quite convincing to the world. The finely developed aesthetic taste of a Libra-Scorpio can meld well with the direct and dynamic energies of an Aries I, the result being a shared flair for interior decorating, architecture, design or fashion. These two can value their relationship with each other whether it is a family connection, a friendship or the basis of a business or professional endeavor. Aries I's are not known for their financial acumen, but Libra-Scorpios have a good eye for bargains and know how to cut costs, and the two can make a good team on the job, with a special talent for sales and marketing. "Pitching" unusual ideas is their forte.

On the down side, Libra-Scorpios are thinkers and commentators who can drive action-oriented Aries I's crazy by trying to analyze and correct their behavior. All kinds of arguments can result, particularly when Aries I's refuse to listen to Libra-Scorpios. Aries I's don't generally look for trouble, but in romantic relations with Libra-Scorpios they may well find it—love affairs and marriages are not recommended for this pair. Even as friends, they may hit it off better as companions and leisure-time partners who can share interests and have fun together than as intimates. Deep friendships often prove a bit stressful for this combination, and mutual benefits may not be satisfying enough for the partners to want to continue it.

Libra-Scorpio parents of Aries I children will generally be caring and protective but can be too insistent on laying down the rules. Some Aries I children, however, may feel more secure when sensible limits are placed on them, and when they are made to assume domestic responsibilities. Furthermore, the relationship may function to make the home a comfortable and aesthetic space. Aries I children often come to idolize Libra-Scorpio parents, and to bask in the warmth of their attention and care.

A Rewarding Rivalry

The meeting of an Aries I and a Scorpio I holds an element of unpredictability, an uncertainty factor that may prove both exciting and unsettling. An adversarial role is common here, though not necessarily a hostile one—these two may do well as team-sport opponents, scientific or artistic rivals, or political or social contenders. With each party competing with the other's best efforts, the Aries I–Scorpio I matchup will often inspire new heights of achievement.

Should Aries I's and Scorpio I's be rivals for the affections of a lover, however, the intensity of their onslaught may ultimately prove too much for a single human to cope with. In love triangles, the gamut of passionate emotions may engulf all three parties, threatening to consume their relationships with each other. And as siblings, particularly when of the same sex, they may compete directly, perhaps for the attention of one or both of the parents. Yet in times of need and crisis, the pair may prove the bulwark of a family's fortunes, and the rock on which it may rebuild after an emotional or financial upset. Loss of a parent may bring the two back together after some years of estrangement and separation.

This relationship can provide an interesting but not necessarily stable marriage. In this form it will have many ups and downs, and will only hold together if internal resources of patience and understanding can be tapped. Certainly great courage will be required to deal with, say, the infidelity of one of the partners, including a decision to stand and fight rather than to give up in a hurtful, blaming or self-deprecatory stance. Children, pets, a home to be proud of, or hobbies and pastimes can all be steadying and rallying points of this relationship in times of unhappiness or turmoil.

ADVICE: Don't carry competition too far. Learn to pull together. Keep in touch. Beware of love triangles. Keep the good of the group in mind.

Twists and Turns

If the focus of this relationship is sexual, as it often is, the combination can be dynamite. Feelings of all kinds run high here as Scorpio II's bring out the most aggressive instincts of Aries I's and Aries I's challenge Scorpio II's to attain the complete expression of their emotional palette. Because of the depth of this relationship's involvement, Aries I's will have to deal with many elements of the human psyche that they would prefer to avoid: jealousy, possessiveness and rage, for example. The volcanic Scorpio II knows these emotions well and can be seen as the Aries I's teacher or guide in fathoming the deepest realms of human feeling.

The important point here is that where Scorpio II feels, Aries I often prefers not to. Many Aries I's think feelings get in the way of their performance, both at work and at play. Love affairs with Scorpio II's may put an end to their frivolity, at least for the time being, and make them confront the more serious aspects of life. Marriages between these two can work out, but sooner or later Aries I's may feel that the relationship's emotions have become too demanding, and may long to escape. Getting away from a Scorpio II may not be all that easy, however, and the struggle may only make bonds between the two tighter, whether they are positive or negative. Friendships in this combination may be meaningful and productive assuming that aggressive and competitive drives can be put away. Difficulties can arise with mutual friends, particularly if Scorpio II's mark out a domain and Aries I's challenge it. Unfortunately, such conflicts may escalate and, if so, they will eventually spell the end of the relationship.

Scorpio II's can be loyal and steadfast parents to Aries I children, often encouraging them to excel in sports. But there is often a danger that they will project their own frustrated ambitions on their offspring. Aries I parents, on the other hand, must learn to leave Scorpio II children alone to work out their moods and emotions. Aries I–Scorpio II siblings, particularly of the opposite sex, may form a mutually dependent bond that continues throughout life.

ADVICE: Learn to give each other room. Avoid projection. Don't let destructive emotions snowball. Stay open and honest.

THE WEEK OF CHARM

Freewheeling Vivacity

The Aries I–Scorpio III combination can make for a dynamic and vivacious team, whether it engages in social or sports activities or in intellectual or business endeavors. The keynote here is vivid imagination, but also the practical skills to create from it, often in the visual arts. Others are often attracted to the relationship's flamboyance and eclectic excitement. The main problem here is a tendency toward impulsiveness, and perhaps toward taking on too much; with these leanings kept in check, it can do well as a business partnership. Scorpio III's know how to hold on to money and Aries I's how to spend it; if they can agree on their priorities, they can make a go of it as commercial partners.

In love relationships, Aries I's may disarm Scorpio III's with their childlike innocence, completely captivating them. Once Scorpio III defenses are up, they don't easily come down, particularly if built up through a number of failed relationships; yet Aries I may seem to be able simply to walk through Scorpio III walls as if they didn't exist. This relationship inspires positive feelings that can drag either partner out of a lethargic or depressive rut.

Even so, the relationship's challenges may prove too much in the long run. Although perhaps gratified by Scorpio III attentions, Aries I's will not easily share their deepest feelings, and after a short and enjoyable affair may take off for parts unknown—and without a lot of goodbyes, either. Too often this treatment will result in further Scorpio III withdrawal, and in yet another promise to themselves never to let it happen again.

In friendships, Aries I's may find Scorpio III's overly demanding and controlling. Not content with shared activities, Scorpio III's will seek to bring their conflicts and searing emotions to the Aries I door, only to find they have reached the wrong address. Aries I's are capable of giving a lot in a friendship, but only up to a point; make them feel taken advantage of and they're gone. The claiming, needy side of Scorpio III's may, unfortunately, bring them to that point.

ADVICE: Limit your goals. Don't let your imagination carry you away. Focus on the practical. Allow for honesty. Act conservatively.

A Swinging Pendulum

Mood swings bordering on wildness, and contrasting ideas and feelings, are likely to dominate this relationship. Yet despite its bipolar nature, and the fact that both of these two have difficulty directing their energies constructively, the relationship allows them to adopt the role of authority figure together, perhaps as co-leaders of a project, and so to carve out a united path. With so many emotional ups and downs, honesty is an imperative; although both parties are strongly moral and do their best to be truthful, they are often unable to be honest about indiscretions or transgressions. An agonizing struggle for the truth is likely to surface here, then, often wasting prodigious creative energy that could be channeled more constructively.

Both Aries and Sagittarius are fire signs, and the fiery personality aspects that these two share will make them compatible with each other. Both tend to value their intuitive side and to follow their hunches. But the relationship points in the direction of emotions, and this can trouble Aries I's, who have little interest in getting bogged down in what they see as a swamp of muddled and contradictory feelings. Although able to relate to the more active side of Aries I's, whether inspirational or confrontational, Scorpio-Sagittarians may also see a coarse and superficial quality in the Aries I denial of subtler emotions. Aries I's may also not be tough enough to hang in there with Scorpio-Sagittarians, hard-headed realists who will probably have little patience for what they see as Aries I naiveté and childishness. Should these two meet as childhood friends or siblings, their relationship may be close and intense, but it will have difficulty surviving into maturity, particularly as Scorpio-Sagittarians become more sophisticated and view their previous ideas with disdain. Aries I's, for their part, may reject Scorpio-Sagittarians whom they see as snobbish and forgetful of their roots.

Neither marital nor business partnerships in this combination are recommended. Should these two fall in love, however, a high unreality factor may allow the relationship to continue for some time.

Unaffected Youthfulness

This classic trine relationship (120° apart in the zodiac) produces an easy compatibility and excellent prospects for longevity, particularly for marriage. Even more promising is the fact that the relationship's catalyst and focus usually lie in the area of thought, so that it produces an intelligence far surpassing that of its individual partners. Ideas about ethics and the raising of children, as well as far-reaching philosophical speculations, characterize this matchup. It is also marked by an unaffected youthfulness, most noticeable in the survival of a strong physical bond, despite advancing age.

The intensity of the passion in love affairs between Aries I's and Sagittarius I's may lead to early burnout. After ecstatic highs, particularly in the bedroom, the partners may experience a gradual falling off of intensity. Not infrequently, however, such a love relationship may settle into an easier friendship, with both parties making fewer demands. One even wonders if these two might not have been better off restricting their feelings to friendship in the first place, for they can make excellent friends, whether of the same or the opposite sex, and may share many gratifying and challenging experiences. They may also be able to open their secret hearts to each other in a way they cannot do with others.

Aries I–Sagittarius I siblings, particularly of the same sex, may be precociously competitive, with largely negative results: the Sagittarius I will to win is so strong that a younger Aries I brother or sister may suffer from it for years. As parents, both Sagittarius I's and Aries I's are often yet not always conscientious: they can be so devoted to their own endeavors that they don't always have the patience to unravel the complexities of their children's emotional states. Moreover, their encouragement of their offspring's independence may later open them to the charge of not having cared enough—of being insufficiently involved and committed. These two must also be careful not to be so one-sided in their views that they become rigid, refusing to bend before crises that demand flexibility, sympathy and understanding.

ADVICE: Regulate the flame of your passions. Remember that fire consumes air and, if permitted, will leave you breathless. Be patient.

Seeing Clearly

This relationship usually hinges on the issue of trust versus rejection. Sagittarius II's often suffer from rejection in their lives, having a tendency to put all of their eggs in the wrong basket, so they may not be overly trusting of Aries I's; the tragedy is that in this respect they may be turning a blind eye to one of the few types in the year capable of understanding and accepting them. Viewed clearly, this relationship can be a source of strength, faithfulness and sustenance to both parties. Yet it can also be considerably passionate and romantic, which may further delude both parties into discounting it, failing to see its strong underlying foundation. Indeed, passionate relationships in this combination are likely to generate a kind of unrealistic haze, obscuring the vision of both parties.

In some cases, distrust between these two will produce the very events they fear. When this occurs, they must try to understand their own roles in creating the disaster. An Aries I who refuses to be put off by a partner's suspicion, aloofness or downright hostility may force a Sagittarius II to see the honesty of his or her intentions, and a satisfying, productive relationship, whether it be friendship or marriage, may result. On the other hand, although Aries I's are generally honorable enough not to degrade or humiliate their Sagittarius II partners, they may be bewildered or even frightened if Sagittarius II's get swept away by intense feelings, and may be put off by certain peculiarities inherent in the Sagittarius II personality. If so, they may withdraw from the Sagittarius II's advances and refuse to get further involved, sometimes by simply dropping out of sight and refusing to answer the phone. When these two work together, the Aries I desire just to get the job done may be frustrated by Sagittarius II idiosyncrasies. Accordingly, the combination is not recommended for most work situations. In the family, Aries I parents may be very understanding of the unusual nature of Sagittarius II children and patient with their need to do things their way. Sagittarius II parents, however, are not always accepting of the unidirectional, often unheeding stance of their Aries I children. Again, the key is trust.

ADVICE: Keep your eyes open. Don't let your vision be clouded by preconceptions or by the past. Don't be discouraged by rejection. Seek higher guidance.

Tipping the Scales

Aries I's and Sagittarius III's make worthy opponents for each other, although the matchup between the Child and the Titan may at times resemble that between David and Goliath, or Alice and the Queen of Hearts. The key to a successful relationship here will be balancing the strengths of the parties involved and working toward common goals. A capacity to work on problems tenaciously is inherent in the relationship, although this ongoing work is hidden from the world. The ability to think things through and address issues is particularly helpful. Initial meetings, whether amorous or social, can have a confrontational edge, which may add spice and enhance the attractiveness of further involvement. Sagittarius III's rarely let their guard down, but Aries I's, through their innocence and spontaneity, may well be able to breach their defenses.

In marriage, one or the other of these two will dominate; there will rarely be an equal balance of power. A hard-driving, career-oriented Aries I may try to lay down the law, but this will only work for a while—sooner or later the assertive power of even the most suppressed Sagittarius III will emerge with a bang. Marriages in this combination will work best when Aries I's reconcile themselves to playing second fiddle to Sagittarius III's as long as their freedom to choose, to come and go, and to make up their own mind on important issues is not compromised or infringed upon. Such an arrangement is quite possible in this relationship.

When Aries I's and Sagittarius III's are lovers, power struggles will emerge between them sooner or later. The fact that only one of them can come out on top will mean that in the long run probably both will lose. Yet these decisive, unidirectional and fiery individuals are actually quite similar and compatible as long as their willfulness and confrontational tendencies stay under control. If one of the lovers makes a decision not to fight, the other will usually accept this kind of unilateral truce, and a harmonious balance can be achieved. At work, the struggle to be the boss threatens to disrupt shared projects; better results will be reached when one of the two is clearly in charge.

ADVICE: Peace may be in your best interest. Take the high road. Try to listen and to compromise. Sometimes, agree on who's the boss.

THE CUSP OF PROPHECY

Don't Worry, Be Happy

The focus of a successful relationship here will be to seek acceptance, psychological understanding and the lightening of heavy moods. The combination supplies a good example of people being attracted to a relationship because it mirrors themselves; this, of course, accentuates not only the negative in each partner's personality, here a self-absorption and a moodiness bordering on the morose, but also the positive—charm, and the ability to work in the service of an ideal. If it chooses, this relationship can act as a guiding light for others.

Aries I's can be impatient with Sagittarius-Capricorns who have gotten stuck in some ideology or who are overly involved in their own emotional state. Sagittarius-Capricorns are usually much too deep and complex to express themselves directly (except in anger or aggression), and more often than not the more direct Aries I's may take their quietness or absence of affect personally. Yet Aries I's also demand a lot of understanding, which self-absorbed Sagittarius-Capricorns are always not ready to give. Friendships or marriages between these two may feature long periods of silence, with corresponding resentment or denial. Dependent on positive outlooks to relieve the inner pressure of their own dark side, Aries I's will find little respite from Sagittarius-Capricorns, whose own moods will tend to drive them further down into themselves. It is therefore essential for these two to work at having a positive outlook and a good time together, and to put their personal problems behind them. Aries I's may well be sexually attracted to the deep and passionate Sagittarius-Capricorn personality, but this is no guarantee that the relationship will succeed. The relationship's longevity is, unfortunately, no index of its quality, for these partners can easily get locked into a mutually dependent embrace that neither of them has the strength to break. Thus they may carry on a love affair that doesn't seem to be going anywhere, yet at the same time refuses to fall apart, for years.

It may be possible for Aries I's and Sagittarius-Capricorns to work together as business partners or co-workers. In this context dynamic Aries I energies and enduring Sagittarius-Capricorn strengths may meld.

ADVICE: Don't hang on too long. Learn to let go. Have more fun. Try to enjoy life without worrying. Seek self-awareness.

THE WEEK OF THE RULER
CAPRICORN I

Autonomous Domains

The creativity of this relationship will lie in a dynamic in which the partners have the strength and wisdom to carve out their own unquestioned domains, in the form of physical locations, functions or activities in which they are autonomous and the other party has virtually no say. This might seem selfish, but questions of leadership and acceptance are paramount in this relationship and are likely to require this drastic sort of solution.

Serious conflicts are bound to arise when Capricorn I's are in a position of authority over Aries I's—for example, in a parent-child or boss-employee relationship. In the early years of such a pairing, Capricorn I dominance may provide Aries I's with the security and structure they so badly need, but sooner or later their opposition and rebelliousness against all tyrannical tendencies will inevitably be aroused. Should the Aries I be the boss or parent, the more passive and dutiful tendencies of Capricorn I's may bring a degree of harmony and effectiveness, as long as Aries I's act responsibly and sensibly. If they prove ineffectual, however, Capricorn I's will usually be prepared to take over the decision-making functions of the company or family.

Marital and love relationships are not especially recommended for this combination, since Capricorn I's will usually seek to limit or modify the individuality and freedom of an Aries I partner, something most Aries I's will be unable to accept. In the emotional sphere, these two are unlikely to share any expression of deep feelings. Friendship is probably the best bet here, whether or not the partners are of the same sex. Capricorn I's will admire and be amused by Aries I directness, and Aries I's will find Capricorn I practicality helpful and reassuring. Dynamism and protectiveness may meld here, then, perhaps producing a partnership in which the establishment or administration of a club, team or other social unit becomes the linchpin of a long-lasting and productive relationship.

ADVICE: Find your own niche and hold on to it. Don't let yourself be kicked around. Look for practical solutions that can benefit everyone.

CAPRICORN II

A Modern Marriage

This relationship can exhibit highly introverted and extroverted tendencies, with great pains taken to hide certain issues, only to bring them unexpectedly and flamboyantly to light one day. Preoccupations with money and power may overshadow more personal matters, which are constantly relegated to second or even third place. A lack of empathy or insight may forestall the emotional understanding needed when moods dictate withdrawal from the world. To escape or even deny the realization that something is missing, quiet depression may alternate with outgoing enthusiasm. Both of these moods avoid the problem at hand, and also keep the world from finding out much about what is really going on in the relationship.

Capricorn II's will constantly be irritated by what they see as unrealistic choices in business associates or favored family members on the part of an Aries I friend or mate—this although they can be as naive as their partner, just in other areas of life. Aries I's, for their part, will see Capricorn II attitudes as oppressive, and will find little or no need to reform. Should Capricorn II ambition or Aries I extroversion get out of hand, each partner may view the other as immoral or selfish and may be strongly disapproving.

As spouses these partners may put their careers first and will discuss not having children, needy pets or demanding domestic responsibilities. The independent modern marriage that results can work out as long as the scrutiny, judgment or disapproval of neither partner becomes a factor, and as long as neither party needs constant emotional reinforcement or attention. If the Aries I–Capricorn III relationship is a friendship, it should perhaps be kept light, since the time, strength or interest in establishing a firm connection is not usually forthcoming. An exception may be the case of lifelong friends, who may need to see each other only once or twice a year to keep their bond viable.

ADVICE: Deal with emotional problems directly. Don't try to escape the truth. Be more empathetic. Control ambition.

Peas in a Pod

This relationship will bring out unexpected sides in both its partners: together they will yearn to investigate universal ideas, and they will share a hunger for a variety of experiences that enhance and deepen consciousness. Neither of these tendencies could be considered typical of either Aries I or Capricorn III individually. Furthermore, because the relationship brings out each person's "higher side," conflicts one might expect to occur between them do not materialize. The synergy of this combination stresses sensitivity and mutual respect and can also allow for a great deal of fun.

Capricorn III's like a lively atmosphere, something many Aries I's can provide. Aries I's, in their turn, will benefit from the attention of Capricorn III's and will gain comfort from their often powerful physical presence. Strong attractions can appear, grow and be sustained by the sympathetic vibrations between the earthy Capricorn III and the fiery Aries I. Thus the combination may become the basis for an enduring, family-oriented marriage.

It will be unusual for these two to carry on a long-standing love affair, however—their relationship will tend to move either toward the permanence of marriage or toward a long-term friendship. Both Aries I's and Capricorn III's tend to be reserved a good deal of the time, yet together they have a flamboyant side that they will enjoy sharing with family and friends. The couple can function well within a social circle and will like to pursue sports, hobbies and club activities together. Yet the core of the friendship is highly private—to gain fulfillment, these two will want to spend long periods of time sitting, walking and dreaming together.

Capricorn III parents don't always do well with Aries I children: although protective and responsible, they tend to be overly dominant. Within a stressed or even dysfunctional family group, however, an Aries I–Capricorn III pair of siblings may be one of the few stabilizing forces, especially if the biological parents are absent or incapable of discharging their responsibilities. In more normal family groups, however, Aries I–Capricorn III siblings of the same sex may exhibit strong competitive and combative tendencies.

ADVICE: Spend quality time together. Don't be afraid to discuss serious issues. Don't isolate yourself or become self-satisfied. Stay objective.

A Protective Cocoon

This relationship may manifest a secretiveness and sense of privacy that isolate its partners in a protective cocoon, keeping them a bit out of touch with the world yet safe from the glare of public scrutiny.

Much time will be spent building a safe haven for the relationship, whether metaphorically or literally. The involvement here may be so total as to arouse jealousy in others, especially family members. Care must be taken, then, not to form a closed community but to leave energies open for involvement with others. When the relationship is a personal one, the danger, of course, is that the partners get so wrapped up in mutual fantasy that they forget about mundane but stabilizing everyday demands. Keeping at least one of their four feet on the ground may be an achievement for them.

Business partnerships and co-worker connections are not recommended for these two, since they may constantly distract each other from the job at hand, making objectivity difficult or impossible. In marriage they can have great times together but may be unable to fulfill domestic, financial and parental responsibilities, at times resulting in chaos. Indeed, the great challenge of the successful Aries I–Capricorn-Aquarius relationship is to bring structure and order to shared activities.

In the spheres of friendship and love, on the other hand, this can be an extremely exciting relationship. Capricorn-Aquarians bring out the most dynamic and outgoing tendencies in Aries I's, who shine in their presence. Although Capricorn-Aquarians have a powerfully dark and eruptive side, their more unstable and violent tendencies are soothed rather than aggravated by Aries I energy, for they find such innocent and child-like energies disarming. As lovers these two can reach the heights of passion, as friends they can attain the deepest levels of mutual understanding and sympathy. Care should be taken, however, not to fall prey to sex and love addictions. In this relationship it may be absolutely necessary to avoid drugs and alcohol, which will fan its already excessive flames still higher.

ADVICE: Try to bring some order into life. Stay in contact with the world. Don't close the relationship off from others. Too much pleasure can be too much.

Free Spirits

This relationship is bound to be scintillating and colorful, emphasizing the spiritual plane above all others. It can be hard to understand, perhaps suggesting a “past-life” connection to its partners and undoubtedly confusing them. To feel fully comfortable in this relationship, both Aries I and Aquarius I will need a maturity that is unusual for them.

Aries I's and Aquarius I's may have a destabilizing effect on each other that does not bode well for them as co-workers or marriage partners. Both of them value their independence highly and are unlikely to want to give it up for the sake of their relationship with each other. Free spirits, Aries I's and Aquarius I's will certainly admire each other, and their mutual attraction may well lead to an intense but perhaps short-lived love affair, involving the physical, the mental and the intuitive planes. The relationship will tap and stir each partner's emotional depths to an unaccustomed degree. Friendships between these two can work out well, with mutual understanding and sharing. Neither will have much patience for the other's moods, however, or much interest in helping the other out of the doldrums; they are really fair-weather friends. Should one partner prove too needy, perhaps falling into a depression after the loss of a job or the breakup of a love affair or marriage, the other may be unwilling to take on the responsibility of dealing with such pain and suffering.

Aries I–Aquarius I siblings lend liveliness to everyday family life. The commotion they often arouse together, however, may be disturbing to quieter or more thoughtful types. Earth- and water-sign parents can have a calming effect on this duo's frenetic energies but may find it difficult to put a cap on their overbrimming enthusiasm. Close bonds may develop in Aries I–Aquarius I parent-child relationships, whichever of the two is the parent. But the adults might let the children go their own way in most situations, without placing many limits or restrictions on them, and this lack of structure may prove unsettling to both Aries I and Aquarius I children, who need a gentle but firm hand.

Rocking the Boat

Because Aries I's and Aquarius II's both have a frank, open and spontaneous outlook, one would think they would be magnetically attracted to each other and form an immediate bond. Yet their relationship often shows a need to confront the dark or shadow side of life and may probe realms that are deeply emotional, even troubled. The combination is very communication oriented, so its explorations will usually occur in the form of long discussions or debates. The relationship also carries with it a hidden but rather rigid structure of mental rules and obligations that will tend to make both partners uncomfortable.

If the relationship can be kept light, Aries I's and Aquarius II's may make excellent acquaintances or friends, sharing many of life's pleasures. Problems arise if they get involved in love affairs or live together, because then their interactions will be more complex and, often, disturbing. Conflicts will surely arise for these two should they compete verbally for the attention of others. As siblings or co-workers, they usually find it difficult or impossible to function together on a daily basis; each will constantly seek to take the spotlight away from the other. Parents or bosses put in the position of siding with one against the other (in other words, of picking a favorite) may figure the task not worth the trouble and wind up ignoring or rejecting one partner or both.

Marriages between these two are unlikely to work well, since neither party is likely to want to assume a more mature role. Should they have children, there are likely to be role reversals in which their offspring (particularly if born under the earth signs, Taurus, Virgo and Capricorn) assume responsibilities at an early age through parental default. Aquarius II's don't look for problems, so they don't find relationships with Aries I's easy to deal with, filled as they are with contrasting moods and outspoken attitudes. In a love affair, for example, Aquarius II insistence on an easy sensuality may periodically be disrupted by Aries I dissatisfaction and frustration. Likewise, the more dynamic Aries I's may come to resent what they perceive as cloying and retarding Aquarius II influences in the career area.

Through the Facade

The keynote to this relationship is discovery—in particular, being able to see through any facade that hides secret or enigmatic desires. In its efforts in this direction, the relationship will tend to set itself apart, isolating itself so that the work of discovery can continue undisturbed. There are many secrets to be revealed here, both within each partner and in the outside world. The more outgoing and dynamic aspects of the Aries I, for example, often conceal a needy individual with subtle dependencies, despite an independent stance; Aquarius III's will be able to uncover and accept this, through a combination of sensitivity (a function of this relationship) and distance.

Although they make a great show to the contrary, both these personalities secretly love to be wooed. And as long as aggressive Aries I's do not intimidate or scare off softer and more accepting Aquarius III's, this relationship is conducive to courtship, and to matters of love and passion. At the same time, an Aries I–Aquarius III marriage or sibling pair may feature a realistic, tough and pragmatic attitude, the Aquarius III balancing the sometimes naive and idealistic Aries I. Marriages between these two can work, usually with the Aquarius III taking the lead. Aquarius III's have a way of unlocking the softer, secret side of Aries I's and allowing them to express sympathy, nurturing qualities, and even sentimentality. A brother-sister relationship between these two may be one of the most successful possible for this combination. Their mutual understanding will be deep from an early age, and when they grow older they usually try to live close to each other, or even to share space under the same roof. Parent-child relationships between these two, on the other hand, particularly when the Aries I is the parent, are usually not rewarding, for there is likely to be miscommunication and a clash of wills.

These two do not make good business partners or team members. Aquarius III's are often scientific and rational types, who, although quite emotional in their personal lives, can be objective and cool on the job; these strengths do not meld with the often impulsive, direct and highly intuitive approach of Aries I's.

ADVICE: Find the real you. Don't waste time on building defenses. Be honest in acknowledging your needs. Appreciate the interest of others.

Disarming the Armor

This relationship involves a refusal to be stopped by walls and defenses. It will break through barriers, especially internal or psychological ones, often through a verbal battering of many thrusts and parries. Needless to say, there lurks within this combination the unfortunate tendency to use criticism as a weapon—verbal exchanges can become very sharp here. If a degree of empathy and sensitivity can be maintained, however, a lot of trust can result from the relationship's emphasis on openness.

The relationship's chemistry allows Aries I's to break through the often heavy armor of Aquarius-Pisces, who will often be enabled, in this context, to express their deepest need: to acknowledge and affirm the sensitivity they had when young. For their part, while they can accept dynamic Aries I energies, they will also be able to encourage the emergence of buried sensitivities in their partner, often through a combination of aggressive, determined, but nonetheless sympathetic approaches. Childlike Aries I energy thus melds with the Aquarius-Pisces capacity for intimacy, and the two may have a rewarding friendship based on honesty and trust. Marriages between these two are also often happy, but difficulties can emerge over the years if the spouses' criticisms of each other become sustained. Aries I's can be tremendously assertive in demanding the attention of Aquarius-Pisces, who are apt to feel a bit inadequate or unfulfilled in this matchup.

Aries I parents are not ideal for Aquarius-Pisces children, who may throw up walls behind which to retreat from them. In many cases Aries I's are simply too direct for their sensitive children to handle. An Aries I sibling can act as a bridge between a brother or sister and the world, particularly through shared hobbies and sports or club activities, for Aquarius-Pisces tend to gravitate toward either the personal or the universal and thus to miss out on the joy of everyday events. The more ambitious elements of the relationship augur well for the success of entrepreneurial or artistic endeavors in which a highly personal and individualistic approach may sweep the field of serious opposition.

ADVICE: Be honest but sensitive. Respect intimacies. Keep a hold on your aggressions. Know when to back off. Beware of fixed assumptions.

An Imaginative World

This relationship will revolve around an imaginative world that emphasizes physical grace, vivid fantasy and gentle idealism. A kind of balancing act is emphasized here, as well as conflicting energies that must be addressed. The relationship is very much about coming to terms with the relative and the absolute, the objective and subjective, the pragmatic and ideal. Aries I's and Pisces I's feel a close kinship, for all their differences; this relationship carries their love of purity and lack of pretension to higher levels.

The sensitive world of feelings that Pisces I's inhabit is foreign to Aries I's, but attractive and strange. At the same time, the straightforward and direct spontaneity and intuitive strengths of Aries I's often challenge Pisces I's to action and spur them on to their best efforts. The combination is perhaps most beneficial for siblings or friends, as long as limits are put on their emotional interaction and their responsibilities for each other.

The matchup may prove difficult in marriage, work or love. The Pisces I need for attention can drive Aries I's crazy, stretching to the utmost their capacity to give it. And it won't just be attention that Pisces I's will demand; sooner or later, they will want a far deeper kind of emotional involvement than Aries I's are prepared for, whether as lovers or spouses. Working relationships between these two are not recommended on the executive level or as boss-employee, but should the two be involved in a project as co-workers, they will be able to work harmoniously side by side, as long as their functions are clearly delineated and don't overlap too much.

Love affairs between Aries I's and Pisces I's can blossom quickly, but will fade just as fast when reality sets in. In the best-case scenarios, Aries I protectiveness and Pisces I appreciation will remain after their passion has cooled down, and the two stand a good chance of continuing on as platonic friends—as long as practical matters such as money, residence and shared possessions have been fairly dealt with. The relationship does not handle resentment and frustration well, so wiping the slate clean of previous failures and starting anew is preferable to endlessly rehashing the past.

ADVICE: Stay on your own side of the bed. Let others make their own decisions. Be the best you are capable of being. Dreams can become realities.

Concrete Beauty

The focus of this relationship is twofold: first, insisting on a more literal meaning in the patterns of thought and speech, and second, bringing a greater aesthetic appreciation to everyday life. Specifically, the relationship will force its partners to concretize their plans in any kind of endeavor, with little allowance for vagueness or drift. Moreover, the combination can itself create an atmosphere that sharpens one's perception of beauty.

Pisces II's let very few people share their private inner life and will rarely allow entry to an outgoing and dynamic Aries I. But this is not to say that they won't get along, or will be antagonists, for as acquaintances or casual friends they may well work out a viable relationship. Marriages between these two are not recommended, however, since the sacrifices that Aries I's would have to make in order to satisfy the Pisces II desire for privacy, and need to create their own world, are unlikely to be realistic ones. Friendships here are likely to be quite unusual, with meetings being severely limited in their frequency and occurring in quite out-of-the-way places.

A positive aspect of any relationship in this combination, whether social, familial or personal, is that it may bring Pisces II's into more meaningful contact with the world. Shared creative projects are especially favored, with Pisces II fantasy and imagination being brought to the attention of the public through Aries I dynamism. Furthermore, the imaginative, creative side of an Aries I will quite likely be deepened and developed by contact with a Pisces II partner. Business, financial or executive partnerships are not as favored here as free-lance work on original products that these two can design and market together. Should a company arise to manufacture and sell such products, it will have a good chance of success as long as legal and fiscal guidelines are followed.

ADVICE: Seek reliable financial advice. Keep good records. Make the world a more beautiful place by starting at home.

Inevitable Awakenings

The pattern in this relationship is for information or insight to come to light suddenly and sometimes shockingly. Neglected issues will often brew until they burst forth, either in a dramatic flash of realization or simply as a gradually emerging truth. A lack of awareness is typical here, so it is not uncommon for this pair to be buffeted by outside events. This can create growth in the relationship but can also endanger it. Attempts at greater consciousness could smooth out some of the shock waves.

Should an Aries I and a Pisces III fall in love, they can keep going for a long time before awakening to the contradictions in their relationship. Aries I's have an inextinguishable need for independence, and any binding of their energies to the needs and demands of a Pisces III will become increasingly strained as the months and years go by. Pisces III's, on the other hand (not known for making realistic partner choices), may fail to comprehend how dependent they have become on their Aries I partners; perhaps needing to be needed, they may undergo a psychological crisis when the Aries I's at last assert themselves. Aries I's who have gone this far in freeing themselves are unlikely to slip back into their old role pattern. Marriages, then, are not particularly recommended here. Friendships are possible between these two, but not openhearted ones characterized by a sharing of deep feelings. They are more likely to be companionships based on common activities, perhaps involving a love of adventure, collecting or performance. Pisces III's have a flamboyant side that can meld with Aries I energies, as long as competition for the attention of friends and family does not get out of hand. Conflicts between siblings, and also with parents of the opposite sex, may be colorful and at times even entertaining, but are ultimately debilitating to the family's stability. Pisces III's who take the lead in the familial, work, social or love partnership may have a tendency to preach and to impose their philosophical views on Aries I's, who are put in the position of student. This is extremely difficult for Aries I's to abide, since they are extremely sensitive to being talked down to or babied. It will usually be only a matter of time before they rebel.

ADVICE: Be more aggressive in dealing with personal problems. Don't assume that all is well. Strive for equality and balance.

Stellar Twins

Two Stars—is there room for both in the same firmament? Probably, but under one roof it can get pretty chancy. Both parties in this relationship need to be at the center of things, which may be a simple impossibility. As siblings or as parents, these two are likely to slug it out for attention, with the stronger or more tenacious winning out. There are really no winners in such conflicts, and the two Stars are better off coming to a mutual decision not to fight, and to shine peacefully in their own spheres.

Love affairs between these two are likely to be tempestuous, adversarial, and mercifully short. Were they to run longer, both lights would risk burnout in a massive supernova. Rebound from such an intense relationship is likely to be attempted with a much more passive and less demanding type. After a torrid affair, two Aries II's are unlikely to continue as friends—there is usually little left in this kind of relationship after the passion has cooled.

Marriage between two Aries II's must only be attempted with great care and great courage. Ideally, it should also involve shared work or career. Power struggles and stress usually build up exponentially in this relationship, depriving both partners of rest. In all honesty, Aries II's are such extreme personalities that they usually do better with more normal, less remarkable types than with each other. Most Aries II's demand that a partner be something of an orbiting satellite around them; should that partner be another Star, this demand will obviously not be satisfied.

For the same reasons, the friendship of an Aries II has its limits, but if both partners have their own, mutually exclusive circles of friends, or sets of satellites, things may work out. The less these two share in the way of human resources the better, although at work they may be surprisingly good at sharing space, equipment and ideas, as long as limits are firmly set and drawn.

ADVICE: Relinquish center stage. Power struggles take away from creative energy. Promote equality. Secure your own area. Work on common goals.

ARIES II

Social Savvy

This relationship focuses on acquiring social skills and coming into a more meaningful connection with the world. A stimulating and productive matchup, it is not afraid to take risks, but its energies, albeit entertaining and theatrical, must be given direction. Aries is not usually considered a sociable sign, but in combination these two will focus a lot of energy on socialization, figuring out the best ways to handle people and perhaps even to climb the ladder of their milieu's society. Both partners will learn valuable lessons in interpersonal dealings through this relationship. Even so, their social success is not guaranteed; mistakes are inevitable, since as a unit they can be brash and outspoken. Aries II's require a lot of patience and attention, but this is precisely what Aries III's may be prepared to give. They understand Aries II fire and spirit, and will rarely compromise or betray it, since they know that Aries II's, if properly led toward a goal, can be a real powerhouse.

One danger here is that Aries II's may find it hard to accept or understand an Aries III ideology, religious affiliation or philosophical stance, and become stubbornly resistant to it. Aries II–Aries III love affairs are not particularly recommended, since both parties can be selfish in their demands, and unprepared to share love or affection. Due to a lack of earthy feelings, deep emotions or both, only in rare cases will the sensual side of their relationship be highly developed. If primarily based around a common lifestyle or profession, marriages between these two may work well, but a meaningful social life, through quality friendships, clubs or organizations, is vital. As siblings, these two may support and mutually challenge each other, particularly if they are of the opposite sex. It is quite likely that each will become involved with the other's friends. But such brother-sister relationships can pose problems for less energetic parents, who may be unable to keep up with their children's prodigious energies, and may also be threatened or at the very least distracted by them. As the parents or bosses of an Aries II child or employee, Aries III's will be well qualified to guide and direct the Aries II's prodigious energies.

ADVICE: Try to find out what makes people tick, and put what you discover to work. Learn from your social blunders. Don't forget to relate to each other sometimes, too.

Forging Ahead

This relationship is usually without a strong emotional orientation, but business or labor-intensive projects can find great success, particularly those of a groundbreaking or pioneering nature. Hard work is characteristic of this matchup, although the partners' tempos are very different, and may clash. Even while focusing on their own goals, as a team these two rarely forget their fellow human beings. One can often find this duo forging ahead in areas with a large social purview, such as politics, even if only as a hobby or a form of service.

While Aries II's are go-for-it types who follow their instincts and react openly when stimulated, Aries-Tauruses are more controlled, and are masters of hanging back and waiting for the right moment to strike. They will often see Aries II's as impetuous and headstrong, and may in consequence be impatient or angry with them. Once the relationship gels, however, these two will usually be able to agree on the approach to and execution of a project, and can be most effective against strong competition in their field.

Interpersonally these two are unlikely to click. Aries II's need to be needed, while Aries-Tauruses pride themselves on needing no one—they hate to ask others for help, regarding this solution as a sign of weakness. There is usually little chance of love or sympathy arising between these two, particularly since both Aries II's and Aries-Tauruses resist others putting claims on them, and generally like to do the choosing when it comes to selecting a mate or friend. Should a powerful sexual attraction manifest here, tensions may build as the Aries-Taurus admires from a distance and makes plans to approach closer. An Aries-Taurus will never submit to being another admiring satellite revolving around the Aries II Star, but will usually wait for the latter to make the first move, or at least signal interest. Once Aries-Taurus does close in, however, it can be with frightening swiftness and power, and Aries II will either reciprocate or repulse the advance. Each partner can be equally selfish in demanding short-term gratification in this relationship, but although their parting may not be pleasant, they may at least have both gotten what they wanted.

ADVICE: Build more for the future. Keep desires for immediate gratification under control. Don't be hasty—find the right time and rhythm for what you do.

Power Partners

This combination can be a powerful one for partnerships of all kinds, especially in marriage or business. The focus here is mutual respect and an ability to delineate areas of dominance and expertise, as well as to hang in there and refuse to admit defeat—a trait that will hold this couple together through rough times. Rarely will these two reveal any problem or tension to the outside world; their relationship never forgets the importance of image, and always tries to make a good impression. It also favors group endeavors and is capable of powerful service to a cause, be it idealistic, commercial, artistic or familial.

The Aries II need to be surrounded by admirers will not necessarily annoy Taurus I's, who can be pretty thick-skinned, and also like to be needed—they will be happy to think an Aries II can't do without them. Indeed Taurus I's enjoy ownership, and may sometimes even come to think of an Aries II partner as another treasured possession. This will ultimately lead to rebellion from Aries II's, who in the end need freedom. They must be careful, however, to know how far they can go without arousing Taurus I anger, jealousy or revenge, which can be frighteningly destructive.

Love affairs between these two may last quite a long time, with the initial physical attraction even growing over the years. In fact Taurus I's and Aries II's can become quite mutually dependent, although neither will ever admit it. Should a power struggle arise over a particular person or issue, it will be only necessary for one partner to take a conciliatory stance to resolve things, at least temporarily.

These two have a good ability to handle issues within the relationship, but problems can arise if either of them sinks into a slump or depression, for the relationship is usually predicated on both of them being strong and dependable. If one shows weakness, the other may only be sympathetic up to a point. Similarly, chronic illness on the part of either the Aries II or the Taurus I can put an unbearable strain on the relationship.

ADVICE: Quitting isn't always either the easiest or the worst alternative. Diplomacy and compromise are often required. Admit weaknesses. Release claims.

Cool Detachment

This relationship often has a strongly mental and, furthermore, critical orientation, and is oddly lacking in emotional sensitivity. Even if sexual, it is cool rather than warm. This may prove a plus, however, since Aries II and Taurus II have a knack for getting on each other's nerves, so that the detachment inherent in the relationship can be its saving grace. Its talent for strategic thinking and the ability to know when to take action makes it well suited to a work situation; research in the social or physical sciences comes particularly to mind.

In love and marriage, on the other hand, tension is likely. Taurus II's have a strict moral stance that may lead them to question a great deal of Aries II behavior. And condemnation of what Aries II's see as perfectly natural may eventually eat away at their happiness and undermine their security. Taurus II's also like their mates to be strong and dignified above all, so that Aries II Stars will be barking up the wrong tree here in their constant need for compliments and attention. Moreover, the sharp and incisive way Taurus II's express themselves can get on the nerves of more balanced Aries II's and strongly upset more irritable ones. In the area of passion, the relationship may be more detached than soulful. Still, on a purely mechanical level sexual compatibility is high, and in erotic terms the relationship can be mutually fulfilling, featuring strong instinctual drives and perceptions. Aries II Stars must be free to shine and do their own thing, so they don't make particularly good students for Taurus II Teachers, and don't readily appreciate such a partner's didactic side. As co-workers, these two will inhibit each other, and frictions or blowups between them will slow down or stall their projects, unless they can maintain their detachment and their orientation toward a goal. If they are siblings, their competition for the attention of others can cause discomfort to all. Taurus II parents, however, can often be very encouraging of Aries II children's self-expression, and very understanding of their need to show their more outgoing and dramatic side, particularly if it makes other family members happy.

ADVICE: Soften your stance a bit. Cultivate an easy sensuality. Learn to relax. Get emotionally involved. Don't be afraid to express your feelings.

Stabilizing Companionship

This relationship can be highly energetic, filled with excitement, change and diversity. It has a wild streak, and strong attractions are typical here. The tendency is toward lack of inhibition, including a frankness of expression that can often come across as critical or hurtful. Often, however, the truth can be a blessing, since neither Aries I's nor Taurus III's are known for their self-awareness.

Since both the individuals involved are free spirits, difficulties may arise if their relationship requires them to give up any independence or accept any responsibilities. The fun-loving and zany side of Taurus III will appeal to the more extroverted type of Aries II, and they can have great times together as friends or lovers. But Aries II lovers are more realistic than Taurus III's, who tend to get carried away by their fantasies, and this may cause conflict. Mutually challenging activities, not the least of which may be satisfying each other, will keep these two from being bored and make them faithful, to an extent—both Aries II's and Taurus III's tend to have a roving eye. As friends of the same sex, Aries II's and Taurus III's may have a rewarding relationship of the kind that emphasizes companionship, and participation in a host of adventuresome or social activities, rather than the development of close emotional ties of sharing and trust. The lack of deep feeling here may actually be stabilizing, for the combination's tendency to outspokenness will cause less damage, and neither party will have to handle the other's shadow side, which can cause trouble if brought into the open. If Taurus III's direct their undeniable wild side toward drugs and similar obsessions, it will prove too much for Aries II's to handle. Aries II's may also be impelled to flee the relationship if sex and love addictions surface in the Taurus III; the level of pain may surpass the level of pleasure.

Marital and business partnerships between these two are usually unfavorable, since neither the ability nor the desire to endure suffering and work out problems, particularly of a personal nature, is high here. Better, then, to keep the relationship light, without too much responsibility, and to keep a back door open for escape if necessary.

ADVICE: Have fun, but take responsibility for your actions. Try not to blurt out the first thing that comes to mind. Challenge helps growth.

THE CUSP OF ENERGY

Stubborn Refusal

The focus of this combination, unfortunately, is a stubborn refusal to give ground; also, both Aries II's and Taurus-Gemini's generally need to be the center of attention. As you can imagine, then, the relationship will rarely be suited for marriage, or for co-worker duos. It may even be difficult for these two to develop a friendship, since they may expect mutual friends to declare a primary allegiance to either one or the other. Adversarial competition and even combat may threaten here, but such conflict will rarely develop fully, since either or both parties will usually back off in dislike before the explosion, and will do their best to ignore animosities. Should these two put their power struggles aside, however, the relationship has an inherent capacity for building a home, team, company or other structure on a sound foundation.

Similarly, although Aries II's and Taurus-Gemini's aren't usually attracted to each other physically, their high energy levels can guarantee some exciting moments. It is also possible for them to work out and even express their antagonisms in the sexual arena, so that their darker feelings and socially unacceptable impulses can lead them into some of the more interesting byways of love. In extreme cases, in fact, a kind of perversity can underlie this pairing. Taurus-Gemini's want to please others, and will often sacrifice their egos in doing so; Aries II's, complementarily, have a tremendous need to be admired and served. On the surface, then, these two would seem to meld harmoniously, though perhaps unhealthily in certain cases, but for the fact that while Taurus-Gemini's are happy to please others they are not prone to paying court to them. Taurus-Gemini parents may enjoy seeing their Aries II children shine and succeed in the world, particularly in the competitive sphere. Aries II parents, however, may be threatened by their Taurus-Gemini children, and may get into power struggles with them. Jealousy and antagonism between Aries II and Taurus-Gemini siblings is more rare—they can usually work out their conflicts through play, notably sports and games, and provide a good match for each other's boundless energies.

Solid Trust

The fire (Aries) and air (Gemini) of this combination form an explosive mixture, but the relationship's real focus is a bond of deep emotion, which can only be established through solid trust. As friends, lovers or mates, these two can only be successful together given near total independence for both parties; one of the few ways this can happen is through an open or free marriage or love relationship. If possessive attitudes are relinquished here, a remarkable acceptance and understanding can hold sway. Another scenario is that faithfulness or monogamy will rule the relationship, which is capable of fortifying parties who might otherwise be easily led astray. The prominence of humor here can lend a further strength to the relationship.

Aries II's and Gemini I's often have an unsettling effect on each other, however. Both are easily irritated and upset, and long periods apart may be necessary to calm things down. Yet such frictions can also be stimulating, and the relationship's moods and anger may quickly pass. In a day-to-day living situation, Aries II work capacity and energy combined with Gemini I quickness and technical expertise can guarantee the success of many domestic, creative or commercial endeavors. Indeed working relationships between these two can be splendidly productive, even though they may get on each other's nerves far more than is comfortable, experiencing a near-constant irritation and friction. Here humor helps a lot. And there are relationships that survive and even flourish on banter, bitter-sweet put-downs and even ridicule, whether well meant or not, and Aries II–Gemini I pairings may well be of this type.

Combative relationships between these two can be very destructive, and where possible should be avoided. Emerging in families, whether as parent-child or sibling pairs, they can be the despair of all around them, always rising to new levels of strife.

ADVICE: Extend an open rein to each other. Others will often live up to your trust. Avoid adopting a double standard. Minimize bickering and strife.

Problems As Lessons

This is a relationship that can teach its partners a lot. Divisive problems are sure to emerge here, but seeing them as challenges to be worked on and solved, and as opportunities for growth, will offer a chance to achieve harmony and wholeness. These two will often want to share with other people what they have learned from their relationship with each other; they will also periodically need to distance themselves from the outside world in order to digest the lessons gleaned.

These partners may initially be attracted to each other: Aries II's will appreciate the vivacity of Gemini II's, finding them entertaining and funny, and Gemini II's will be attracted to the brighter side of Aries II's, admiring their robust approach to both work and play. Particularly on the physical level, this relationship can go like a house on fire at first. Unfortunately, though, it can burn out just as quickly. This is when the partners can start learning from each other. Aries II's, for example, have a shadow side that they often have a great deal of trouble getting to know and expressing; a Gemini II may well activate this shadow side, making it available to be explored. Working through difficult periods with a caring and attentive Gemini II may involve all kinds of emotional problems and depressions for an Aries II, but may also offer a real way of getting in touch with his or her deeper self. Married Gemini II's and Aries II's will share a love of entertaining friends, throwing parties, sharing sports and fitness activities, and going out in the evening. This extroverted streak will need to be balanced, however, by quiet and relaxed times together at home, something they may both have to work on. Here again there are important lessons to be learned, particularly if children are involved.

On the down side, Aries II's may be irritated by the flakier aspects of Gemini II's, and Gemini II's for their part may eventually become fed up with the excessive aspects of the Aries II personality. But it may not be possible for Aries II's to scale back their habits and activities, and if the Gemini II's impatience and the Aries II's dissatisfactions are not dealt with, the relationship may disintegrate.

ADVICE: Keep impatience under control. When challenged, have faith in the power of love. Work actively on problems—the rewards can be great. Be sure to spend time alone.

A Magnetic Mirage

The initial phase of this relationship can be deep and magnetic, almost hypnotic, and is further augmented by an intriguing charm, pleasure orientation and overall sensuousness. The partners cannot help but be swayed by these influences, and once ensconced in the relationship they will find it difficult to emerge from it or leave it behind.

Neither Aries I or Gemini III is used to this kind of energy, and neither will know how to handle it. Gemini III's are likely to put Aries II's up on a pedestal; prone to hero- or heroine-worship when young, they are likely to repeat childhood patterns in their adult love relationships and friendships. If so, they will be casting the Aries II in the latter's favorite role, as star. The egotism of Aries II's may initially impress Gemini III's as strength and self-confidence until it becomes apparent how needy these personalities really are. Usually the more realistic of these two in their choice of mates, Gemini III's will probably realize early on that Aries II's are not for them. Even so, the relationship's magnetic attraction will prove difficult for them to get free of, attracted as they are to all that intrigues. In fact Gemini III's may find themselves morbidly fascinated by their own entrapment in the relationship, and by Aries II's seemingly fixed role as the centerpiece of an intricate web.

In the family, the Aries II-Gemini III relationship can be more rewarding, even outstandingly so, particularly with Gemini III's the parents to Aries II children, and as long as such parents don't release their own frustrations or disappointments by projecting their personal goals onto their children, forcing them to over-achieve in challenging professions. These two can also make an effective combination as business partners, with Aries II's blazing the trail and Gemini III's attending to financial matters. Here the relationship's inherent charm can win over clients and win accounts. Both parties are risk-takers, but they will usually be cautious enough to make their calculated gambles pay off.

Relaxed in Love

This relationship has a strong sense of the relaxed, natural and unpretentious, and a strong dislike of fuss and bother. Together these two exhibit a simple, even inspiring grace. Aries II's generally need to be surrounded by admirers, but may give all that up, preferring one unaffected glance, kiss or embrace from their Gemini-Cancer lover to all the starry-eyed attention of their fans. Since Gemini-Cancers give lavishly of their admiration and devotion if they are truly in love, this relationship can usually satisfy even the strongest Aries II needs. Aries II's may well respond with a passionate intensity that Gemini-Cancers will find sexually and emotionally rewarding. As marriage or living partners, these two may have a little difficulty in adjusting to each other, primarily because of the Gemini-Cancer need for privacy. Aries II's will be prepared to give up a lot for Gemini-Cancers, and can remain faithful, but their need for social contact may leave Gemini-Cancers sitting alone on many evenings, or, worse, trying to cope with a houseful of unwanted guests. Should the Aries II make it clear to others that their door is always open, the Gemini-Cancer may be forced to take steps to scale down the traffic, and conflicts are bound to result. In arguments, Aries II aggressiveness may prove too much for sensitive Gemini-Cancers, who may withdraw. Yet conflicts can be negotiated and tensions diffused, simply through the relaxation inherent in the relationship.

Robust Aries II career drives are unlikely to find favor with more low-key Gemini-Cancer ambition, and this relationship is not recommended in business and at work. Furthermore, Gemini-Cancers who truly desire worldly success must operate in their own, highly individual way, which will often limit their participation in group endeavors. Their tendency to take the lead will also reduce their ability to meld with an ambitious Aries II.

Gemini-Cancer parents can be understanding and sympathetic with their Aries II children, but Aries II parents of Gemini-Cancer children are less effective. Siblings in this combination can generally live and play naturally together, particularly when of the opposite sex.

ADVICE: Try to compromise. Be diplomatic in making suggestions or demands. Be open to mutual social interaction. Beware of controlling attitudes.

Not Too Close

The bond will be deep and the feelings intense, but combative and antagonistic drives rule this relationship. The deeper the feelings, in fact, the more rebellious the energies usually at work. Acquaintanceships and companionships, then, are more favorable with this combination than marriages, love affairs or friendships, and these two may function best of all as co-workers or business partners. As long as deeper personal contact is not required to any large degree, these two personalities' very different strengths may complement each other beautifully. The technical proficiency and sound money sense of many Cancer I's meld well with the ambition and drive of Aries II's. Together these two have an executive ability that can prove useful, and lucrative, in business.

Aries II's generally find Cancer I's much too strange to become deeply involved with, and Cancer I's in turn may be put off by Aries II aggression and need for attention. These two actually have a lot to teach each other, but their relationship is unlikely to overcome the emotional barriers between their fundamentally opposite natures. There may be a substantial sexual or romantic attraction between them, but it probably won't lead anywhere, and if it does, it may ultimately prove painful to both parties. As friends, these two are usually unsuited to deep emotional sharing, but their mutual strong need for physical expression can make them excellent sports or fitness partners, with Aries II's taking the lead.

Cancer I's can be very understanding parents but not particularly good role models for Aries II children, who will usually want a much more dynamic and self-confident choice than their Cancer I parent to emulate. Yet the emotional side of an Aries II, often repressed or ignored, can be deeply touched by a Cancer I parent, who may thus teach the Aries II the worth of emotions and of spiritual values early on in life. As parents, many Aries II's have neither the patience nor the understanding to deal with the difficulties and personal problems of Cancer I children.

ADVICE: Keep it businesslike and objective. Develop respect and cultivate trust. Respect emotional differences.

Unlocking Energies

This combination tends to reveal to its partners sides of themselves that they never knew existed, or that they have always secretly wanted to know. It is a relationship, then, that sets both partners on a road to self-discovery. As such, it unlocks enormous energy, which usually becomes its focus: where is all that energy to be put? What does one do with the talents and skills that the relationship reveals? One puts them to use, of course, almost frantically. As a result, the relationship will be known for its frenetic pace, and its achievements.

Since Aries II and Cancer II birthdays are square to each other (90° apart in the zodiac), conventional astrology would predict that these two personalities would not get along or be a good match. They are indeed very different, and conflicts are indeed sure to arise, but a mutual fascination may result in a pleasurable love affair or an interesting and rewarding marriage. Once the relationship is established, the synergistic process of personal realization can begin. While Aries II's benefit from the much-needed self-discovery offered by this matchup, they can help Cancer II's step out into the world to realize some of their wishful fantasies. It may also happen that Cancer II's merely project their dreams and desires onto their partners, being satisfied to watch the Aries II act out their secret ambitions. A Cancer II parent who makes such projections on an Aries II adolescent may do no harm as long as both parties are aware of what is going on. Sensitive Cancer II's who engage in hero worship of an Aries II parent or authority figure, on the other hand, may find that the object of their admiration is busy with her or her own pursuits, and doesn't always have time for them.

In friendships, Cancer II's who show Aries II's their whole inner world of feeling can gain a deep and lasting relationship. The only danger of this very unusual matchup may be that the partners become too dependent on each other. The final test may come if one of the parties leaves, when it will become apparent whether or not they can function as well-rounded human beings without each other.

ADVICE: Focus on individual strengths as you discover and follow your own path. Beware of mutual dependencies. Direct your energies wisely.

Chafing Against Restraint

Strikingly independent, this relationship chafes against almost any form of restraint. Together, this pair will overturn structure willy-nilly. The matchup's devil-may-care attitude toward the existing order will be very attractive and freeing, especially to Aries II's, but can ultimately prove dangerous. Sobriety will eventually set in as the two begin to revolt against each other. This relationship will cause others to want to follow its lead, so care must be taken to wield its power carefully.

Cancer III's are often persuasive people who could sell a salesman back his own product, but they may have little luck with Aries II's. For one thing, Aries II's are so busy striving toward their career goals that they usually have no time to stop and listen to Cancer III sales pitches. For another, Cancer III's may become so dazzled by the Aries II Star that they get tongue-tied and lose their chance. In any event, these two will usually lack both the shared traits and concerns that would hold their relationship together emotionally and the ability to handle the independence required here. Lasting love affairs or marriages in this combination are unlikely, then, but the matchup usually has better luck as a friendship—these two may enjoy good times together, as long as Cancer III's keep their judgmental, bossy side under control and Aries II's don't get carried away by selfishness or vanity.

As professionals working together, particularly in an entrepreneurial environment, Aries II's and Cancer III's may be able to achieve more than at any other time, and to advance their personal aspirations and standings. Their ambitions can meld well if they are partners on the same side, but if they are rivals their clashes can be terrifying. In out-and-out competition for, say, the lead position in an organization, each can be quite ruthless, or can unilaterally break off the relationship. Sibling relationships too may be competitive, even combative, and strife can emerge well into adulthood, perhaps on the death of a parent. Aries II children will often resent Cancer III parents as manipulating and controlling, and Aries II parents may bring out Cancer III children's insecurities, perhaps through hero worship combined with low self-esteem.

ADVICE: Give up power struggles if you want to get closer. Put childhood conflicts behind you. Eliminate bossiness. Pull together.

Exciting Activities

Outgoing and adventuresome, this combination values excitement and even danger; activities ranging from hang gliding to river rafting, scuba diving and snow-boarding are not unusual here. In this aspect the relationship can be a lot of fun, but psychological support and deep emotional understanding are seldom well developed here, so that friendships and marriages tend to stay at a relatively superficial level, and have little to fall back on in times of trouble or stress. This coupling works best when geared toward transcending physical or metaphysical limits.

With their hard-working natures and their desire to meet the everyday practical needs of others, Aries II's may nevertheless prove a great support to Cancer-Leos incapacitated by depression or moodiness. In fact the Aries II partner is often called upon to do double work until the next Cancer-Leo emotional upswing. Cancer-Leos also have a sensitive, emotion-oriented side, which can be sympathetic to the problems of Aries II's and may help them to discover and express themselves openly in more passionate relationships.

If these two are live-in lovers or mates, their biggest problem is likely to be that the security Cancer-Leos so desperately need is undercut rather than augmented by Aries II popularity. Watching their partner be surrounded by admirers, and being bombarded by the sounds of telephone, fax and front door bell, are unlikely to put Cancer-Leos in a settled frame of mind. As parents, Cancer-Leos may find this aspect of their relationship with an Aries II teenager almost unbearable at times.

Should the relationship manifest in the area of sports or business, it usually shows the kind of guts and drive that guarantees success; the challenging aspects of the matchup usually bring out the aggressive, ambitious sides of its partners. Even so, working relations may at times be unfulfilled, due to a lack of appreciation and understanding on a personal level.

ADVICE: Seek emotional stability. Reflect on how you give support. Strive for deeper understanding. Express feelings honestly.

Buffeting Competition

Fortunately or unfortunately, the keynote of this relationship is often hard-fought competition or outright combat. The upside of this periodic open warfare is that it spurs the relationship on to new heights of achievement; the combination emphasizes independence and originality to an extreme degree. Both these personalities are self-assertive, and for good or ill, passions will run high here, while sympathy and understanding will be noticeably lacking. If the considerable ambitions of Aries II's and Leo I's are directed to the same goal, however, the relationship can be very successful.

If it reaches the stage of marriage, the Aries II–Leo I relationship can attain a modus vivendi, a sort of truce, including a tacit agreement not to fight. Should the partners disagree, and be unable to discuss their differences, they may choose to just ignore each other, or to walk away and leave things to sort themselves out. This approach, however, may lead to great frustration and eventually a breakup. When Leo I's set themselves up as unimpeachable experts on any subject, for example, their Aries II partner may well respond by turning a deaf ear, or may push their spouse's buttons by cleverly praising an established authority's contrasting point of view. On the other hand, the Leo I attachment to ideals and principles may lead more self-centered Aries II's feeling a bit left out in the cold.

Kindness, patience and understanding are unlikely to be passed on to the children of this relationship. In marriages and love affairs, this pair may experience ecstatic sexual highs between periods of hard work and independence, but may never reach deeper levels of human feeling, whether together or with others in the family.

Needless to say, in the work sphere this duo is extremely well matched, whether as adversaries or associates, since they are both extremely willful and usually know exactly what they want. Should they both desire the same object, person or job, open struggle is likely to surface. When working in smooth combination as team players, mates or co-workers, on the other hand, these two can be unbeatable.

ADVICE: Try to learn compromise. Tone down your more excessive drives. Keep lines of communication open. Be patient. Listen to suggestions and criticism.

Mutual Admiration Society

The trine relationship between Aries II's and Leo II's (approximately 120° apart in the zodiac) is traditionally thought to make their combination an easy, comfortable one, and indeed this matchup can work out well, particularly in the area of friendship. The relationship emphasizes communication, and will develop a personal and intimate common language—not necessarily a verbal one—that can be the basis for a great deal of intimacy. These two both work and relax well together, sharing humor throughout.

Marriages in this combination may be very successful. Aries II's must respect the Leo II need to be left alone, however, and must also resist depending too much on their spouse's habitual balance and stability: should the Leo II become unglued, the Aries II may go into a tailspin after years of dependency on his or her reliable mate. Nor should Leo II's glorify or idealize their partner too much—in fact this combination's tendency to form a mutual admiration society may undermine the relationship's stability by preventing it from confronting and working through problems. Aries II's tend to look up to Leo II's, and Leo II's are glad at last to meet someone who can match them in energy and intensity.

In love, Leo II loyalty will be important in holding the relationship together. This has its downside, however: if Aries II's are unhappy they will not hesitate to search around for solace or a change of scene, or perhaps will go on wild binges, leaving the Leo II doggedly hanging in there. Much pain may result for all concerned if the Leo II refuses to let the relationship fall apart even after it has outlived its healthy span.

As co-workers these two may have rough times. For all their strength and self-confidence, Leo II's can react badly when forced to confront failure. Aries II's are tougher, but the sight of them continuing blithely along after a crisis or setback may not be the easiest thing for Leo II's to accept.

ADVICE: Keep in touch with the world. Acknowledge and solve problems. Don't put all your eggs in one basket. Cultivate diversity and flexibility.

The Best and Worst

Looming large, this combination is one to be reckoned with: in any area, this pair won't hesitate to use whatever means are at their disposal, including unethical ones, to achieve their aims or to win. Depending on the goal, then, the matchup can bring out both the best and worst in its partners. Within the relationship, both personalities are unlikely to back down from a confrontation, making marital, business and other partnerships that require daily contact likely to be fraught with periodic conflict and crisis. The main issue will be over which partner dominates the other.

As a unit, the relationship has tremendous charisma, persuasiveness and power, and many will be attracted to it. If there is a love affair, it may well be a passionate one. Since each party has an intense need to dominate, ego-tripping and resentment are likely to abound. So great a challenge do these two represent for each other that the affair may go on for some time, particularly if it is a covert or illicit one.

Same-sex siblings are likely to fight for dominance as they enter adolescence, but opposite-sex siblings can form a close and enduring relationship. As parents and children, Aries II's and Leo III's are fated to work out dominant/rebellious drives, no matter which is the parent and which the child. Aries II–Leo III friendships can be very close, as long as competition is limited to some harmless and controlled arena, such as sports. Any other conflict, particularly over the affections of a third party, is likely to break up the team. The relationship must usually come first if it is to survive.

ADVICE: Develop common ideals and try to live by them. Moderate ego and power drives. Beware of jealousy and relationship triangles.

THE CUSP OF EXPOSURE

Acting Out

This relationship often involves psychological projection, since in many ways an Aries II is a Leo-Virgo revealed. Aries II's, in other words, with their forthright drive for success, act out the secret desires and the self-confidence that Leo-Virgos can keep inside for years; and when Leo-Virgos watch shining Aries II Stars in action, they may be viewing a living projection of their own suppressed self. Meanwhile, as Leo-Virgos seek in Aries II's their own ability to be the star, Aries II's will be learning from Leo-Virgos lessons about independence, self-sufficiency and the preservation of one's own inner privacy. What is the ultimate purpose, then, of this relationship? To seek and find in the other what has been lost, or never truly revealed, in oneself. Thus the relationship can serve an important function in each individual's quest for wholeness.

Leo-Virgos wait a long time before revealing themselves to the world. It is quite possible that they will initially disapprove of Aries II extroversion, which may strike them as impetuous and lacking in self-control. Yet a part of them may admire their Aries II friend's extroverted pose, since eventually they will want to experience this trait for themselves. It is unlikely, however, that they will ever fully join the Aries II fan club. To the same degree that Aries II's need other people to depend on them, Leo-Virgos are self-sufficient, and loathe depending on anyone. As lovers, Leo-Virgos are unlikely to give themselves completely to Aries II's, since they require a level of understanding and faithfulness that Aries II's just may not supply. The relationship is unlikely, then, to reach the heights or depths of love or passion. Similarly, an Aries II and a Leo-Virgo are unlikely to form the deepest of friendships, unless the former is really drawn irresistibly to investigate the mysterious turns and byways of the latter's character.

On the face of it, marriage may not be a good bet for these two. Should they marry, neither may be willing to make the commitment to having children or giving them the time and attention they need. Furthermore, the burden of domestic work and responsibility may tend to fall in the lap of the Aries II, who will become the central hub around which the family revolves.

ADVICE: Remember that what you admire or dislike in others is usually a part of your own makeup. Find your own path and stay on it. Be more honest about your feelings.

Getting the Job Done

Hard work will be of primary importance in this relationship; the focus will also be on dividing responsibility and roles to get the job done. The relationship may begin at work, on a leisure-time or professional project, and wind up as a fast friendship.

Aries II's have a deep need to share their work, and this may find fertile ground in the patience, devotion and discretion of the Virgo I personality. In fact Virgo I's may get closer to Aries II's than all of the latter's other admirers or flatterers, simply because they are willing to get in there alongside them to achieve the task at hand. Both these personalities are energetic workers, and their approaches, though different, do not clash. In the pursuit of their outward activities, Aries II's may actually be hiding from themselves, while the Virgo I work penchant has more to do with a need to serve, and also with a talent for taking structured action. Even though Aries II's may be unable to understand or relate to the more complex aspects of the Virgo I personality, these two may develop a sound marital or business partnership, with Virgo I's actually benefiting from the company of someone who does not take their moods or depressions too seriously, and who insists on either taking them out and having a good time or concentrating on objective pursuits.

Should the relationship involve romance, there is a danger that Aries II charisma will bring out Virgo I insecurities, particularly with the many admirers of the Aries II hanging around. Should Virgo I's feel rejected and suffer a loss of self-esteem, they may well back off and end the relationship. Ideally, this pair's ability to work hard at something will be applied to the relationship as well.

Siblings in this combination can benefit the family group greatly through their ability to satisfy the needs of others, as long as their efforts can be coordinated without too much conflict. In another family scenario, the spontaneity and excessiveness of Aries II children can be constructively guided by understanding Virgo I parents without robbing them of their individuality.

ADVICE: Coordinate your efforts and structure your activities. Try to be more sympathetic. Work on psychological problems, especially insecurities. Escape is not the answer.

Uncommon Intimacy

This relationship grows out of a strange combination, but it works in hidden ways that no outsider would suspect. Its essence is mysterious yet magical, and should love be permitted to bloom, it can be quite charming—much to everyone's surprise.

On the surface, Virgo II's are discriminating, even fussy individuals who would seem unlikely to be attracted to the raw energy characteristic of Aries II's. Yet they may be secretly attracted to Aries II charisma, even gaining vicarious satisfaction from the attention that others pay these Stars. Should they go so far as to feel that they possess or even just understand an Aries II, whether in fantasy or actuality, they may be proud of the fact that they can lay claim to such a sought-after item.

If sexual, the relationship may be close and even erotically adventurous, since both Aries II's and Virgo II's admire technical proficiency. If Virgo II's hanker after the kind of energy Aries II's can provide, things will be straightforward. If not, Aries II's are not about to change to fit the many complex and unusual requirements of Virgo II's, who may consequently be forced to use more subtly persuasive means to get what they need. Interesting and unexpected intimacies may emerge between these two, most of which will not be apparent to the outside world. Whether or not it gets physical, the relationship is marked by romantic fascination. These partners can truly admire each other from afar, being strangely attracted to what they view as their opposite—introverted Virgo II to a blazing extrovert, outgoing Aries II to a strange introvert. Like romances or affairs, friendship, family and business relationships in this combination can exhibit such an unusual bond as to confound those around them. No matter what the relationship's nature, neither partner is likely to want or be able to share profound emotional or spiritual levels of experience with each other. This will matter little, since the intimacies within the relationship will keep it on stable ground. In business, however, the relationship's chemistry may not be conducive to forwarding an enterprise's success.

ADVICE: Pursue your fantasy, but be sensitive to conventional attitudes. Cultivate the spiritual side. Try to be more open. Don't exclude others.

Stiff Resistance

As partners, these two are unlikely either to give ground to others or to be too flexible with each other. Their relationship is marked by battles to mark out territory and decide who will rule the roost. A forward, demanding attitude characterizes their combination; compromise or diplomacy are nearly impossible here. Unfortunately, each partner brings out the other's selfish aspects, so that marriages and friendships may travel a rocky road.

In marriage and at work, the relationship will benefit if common causes demand the attention of both partners. As long as they both benefit, these two can in fact get along and even cooperate. Should it become clear that one is being rewarded more than the other, however, almost any joint venture they are engaged in is likely to suffer. Virgo III's can be ruthless about walking away from living or working relationships with little explanation, but in Aries II's they may have met their match in the hot potato department—that is, in the ability to drop what they are doing with total abruptness if it turns troublesome.

These two are unlikely to form a lasting love relationship, even if they arouse each other's fire. Short and passionate romantic couplings are generally the order of the day. Aries II's and Virgo III's will rarely want to spend enough time together to become friends, but on the other hand they are not subject to the kind of mutually destructive drive that would make them enemies or rivals. The relationship often does best when its partners choose to keep a polite distance from each other, whether out of respect or out of lack of interest.

In the family the Aries II–Virgo III relationship is often willful and headstrong, and can catalyze tremendous battles, whether these two are siblings or parent and child. A lasting peace may be impossible here, but in times of stress the duo is capable of pulling together to salvage mutual interests.

Deepen the Bond

The test of this relationship is whether the partners can empathize with each other. There is certainly no guarantee that they can, although their relationship can help make this happen. Since neither Aries II's nor Virgo-Libras are particularly concerned with the inner workings of either their relationships or themselves, in a way they are perfect for each other. Together they may try to understand the issues of their own connection. Not the least of these is the fact that this relationship wants to present itself to the outside world in the most refined light possible. Tinkering with its inner workings will be necessary to accomplish this aim. Almost inadvertently, this process will result in a deepening bond within the relationship—and in a deeper understanding.

Still, the relationship will initially be based on the superficial. Drawn to attractive people, Virgo-Libras can find much to admire in the appearance of Aries II's, and will find it gratifying that so many pay court to these Stars. Virgo-Libras can be extremely trendy, and will pride themselves on having a popular Aries II as a companion or lover. Aries II's for their part may be gratified to have been chosen by such discriminating and graceful individuals. If empathic feelings and the desire to look deeper do not eventually emerge, however, marriage or long-standing friendship is probably better not contemplated. Attractiveness and popularity fade, and so may Virgo-Libra desire for a no-longer-stunning Aries II partner. Unless Aries II's have a special interest in aesthetic matters, meanwhile, they may easily tire of Virgo-Libra interest in art objects, bric-a-brac and interior decorating or design. In the workplace, Virgo-Libras may both demand and fail to find a level of sophistication or chic in Aries II co-workers, who may conversely view Virgo-Libras as snobs. The Aries II desire to be at the center of every project may also run counter to Virgo-Libra taste and become a stumbling block to any joint effort. Perhaps the best combination for these two is as family members, where they will have a great deal to teach and share with each other, and will improve the image of their group.

ADVICE: Beauty fades, character doesn't. Work on adopting less trendy values. Don't be swept away by glitz and glitter. Try to understand each other's feelings.

Career Goals

This relationship usually focuses on career. Aries II's and Libra I's characteristically share a drive toward success, and this becomes the core of their relationship. They may quite possibly meet as co-workers on a project and then decide to broaden their relationship when the job is done, or even while continuing to work together. They are both competitive people, and their ambition is often reflected in the intensity of their love or friendship. In such cases they must beware of burnout, for if they spend all their time working together, either their public or their private relationship is bound to suffer.

Libra I's may drive Aries II spouses crazy with their indecision and procrastination. Their efforts to present themselves as decisive will only make things worse, being quickly exposed as self-delusive by Aries II's whose expectations have not been met. Aries II's for their part will be stung by Libra I criticism and perfectionism. After all, they like being just what they are (and being admired for it), whereas Libra I's are born reformers who think they can improve anyone or anything. In objective pursuits, the Aries II motto is "If it works, don't fix it." Libra I's, on the other hand, usually can't keep their itchy hands from trying to making things run more smoothly.

These two are ardent lovers. Extremely attentive to their partner's romantic and sensual needs, Aries II's and Libra I's may carry on a long-standing sexual relationship. If their desires remained unspoken, things would probably work out fine, but Libra I's always want to talk about everything, particularly what they think needs improvement. Sooner or later, Libra I perfectionism will take its toll on Aries II's, who can't stand being constantly analyzed and corrected. Eventually the Libra I checklist of what they would like done for or to them in intimate situations will begin to bother Aries II's, who like to be themselves and to follow their intuition, avoiding fixed routines. The best outlet for this combination will always be career. If bent on the same goals, these two can accomplish more together than apart. Setting aside their differences in the name of achievement is possible and profitable for them.

ADVICE: Try to identify clearly the goals you share, and put your focus there. Back off—your involvement is too heavy. Let things happen as they will.

An Unconventional Education

This relationship's primary concern will be to analyze, chronicle and examine the workings of the people and the world around it. Since this is very much the forte of Libra II's, they will act as the teachers here and will probably enjoy the relationship more than Aries II's will. But Aries II's have much to learn in this regard, and in Libra II's they gain the perfect authority. More advanced Aries II's will engage in this relationship eagerly, knowing that it will be a real education for them. These two are exact opposites in the zodiac, positioned 180° apart. Their relationship, then, is highly unconventional, private and not easily understood by others.

There can be a strong attraction here, but Libra II's may ultimately have difficulty in handling the direct and uncompromising energy of Aries II's. In interpersonal relationships, an Aries II can approach a Libra II like a knife cutting butter. Libra II's will do their best to make the relationship more agreeable and less strange, but their penchant for compromise is usually a poor defense against Aries II willpower. Still, the ability to observe an Aries II at close range will often prove irresistible to them.

Libra II's know a great deal about the world and its inhabitants. They may be just the right people to take Aries II's under their wing, teaching them a great deal about how to dress, how to act, in fact how to present themselves generally in the most advantageous way. Always eager to be the center of attention, wiser Aries II Stars will lap this information up. As parents or mates, then, Libra II's can be excellent guides and helpers for Aries II's. Friendships between these two may be warm, with a strong bond of sympathy and appreciation.

As co-workers, on the other hand, these two may not gel. Busy as they are in observing the world and each other, it may be difficult for them to focus on getting ahead. The relationship will have its rewards, however: Libra II's tend to be indecisive and unsure of themselves, and in this area self-confident and driving Aries II's have their own lessons to teach Libra II's about becoming successful in the world. From Aries II's, Libra II's can learn how to promote themselves and to take more decisive action without waffling.

ADVICE: Toughen up. Don't spurn more conventional solutions. Learn about the world through shared experience. Be understood. Try to speak each other's language.

Emotional Volatility

This relationship speaks of temperament, challenge and high passion. It has a tendency for dynamic confrontations, and puts a premium on grim determination and on the ability to persuade or convince. In all of these partners' struggles, the winner, or at least the least damaged party, is likely to be the one who can stay objective and not get carried away by a flood of emotion.

Aries II–Libra III love affairs are liable to be stormy, punctuated by breakups, play-acting, mock emotion and manipulation. For the most part, frustration, depression and repression are not issues here, since the relationship is so volatile as to leave little hidden. If these two can keep from tearing each other apart, however, they may find their challenging relationship pleasurable and fulfilling. Whether they are live-in lovers or spouses, their daily life can be highly rewarding, particularly for the Aries II, and as long as the extreme need of Libra III's for independence is respected—as long, that is, as there are no undue family or domestic responsibilities to cope with.

Either member of this duo is likely to bring out the other's extroverted side, and either can be the life of the party. One consequence of this is that competition and jealousy can recur between these two. The Libra III come-on, of course, is usually cooler and more detached than the fiery Aries II approach, but when these partners are on a collision course, Libra III's are capable of exploding in fury. Each of these personalities needs to be at center stage, and should they meet there, each will demand an equal share of the attention. Because of the relationship's competitive tendencies, its activities are sometimes better off confined to the gym or playing field than the bedroom or corporate boardroom. Rather than friendships, Aries II's and Libra III's are more likely to develop companionships in which they share dangerous adventures, or partnerships in a particular sport. Libra III's are not usually family oriented, but the one exception is a close bond with a sibling, usually of the opposite sex, when growing up, and Aries II's are a particularly good bet for this role.

ADVICE: Try to give way to each other. Learn to share the spotlight. Develop more cooperation and communication. Cultivate emotional control.

THE CUSP OF DRAMA & CRITICISM

A Sword of Damocles

Dominating others and each other will be an ever-present theme in this combination. Both Aries II and Libra-Scorpio tell it as they see it, leaving little room for niceties, an approach that can easily border on coercion in their relationship with each other. Should they be united in a common goal, however (unlikely though this may be), they can easily dominate others.

Aries II's who plunge in head over heels in love with Libra-Scorpios can expect some difficulty: like a child suddenly and ruthlessly exposed to the adult world, they will be practically defenseless against this controlling and critical partner's searching mind and emotional power. To put it simply, if the Libra-Scorpio is pleased, things will go well; if not, then Aries II's can expect endless frustration in trying to serve or please a dominant master who cannot or will not be satisfied. In many ways, this dissatisfaction is like a sword of Damocles that the Libra-Scorpio dangles precariously over the Aries II's head.

Marriage may be problematic for these two, as they have very different approaches to life, and both may seek to impose their own way on the relationship. Aries II's proceed more by intuition than by book learning, and often want to translate their ideas into immediate action; Libra-Scorpios, on the other hand, like to have time to mull things over, and may see Aries II energy as rash and impetuous, Aries II judgment as naive and untutored. A Libra-Scorpio parent may look on the energy of an Aries II child as raw material to be worked and molded into a more finished product. Unfortunately, this is usually not at all what the Aries II has in mind, and there may be endless argument and conflict. At work, the relationship has a better chance of success if the Libra-Scorpio is the company owner or executive and the Aries II is the employee. In this way Aries II energies can be directed and supervised, and if the job is a good one, few complaints or difficulties will arise.

ADVICE: Strive for greater equality. Power struggles can be energy-depleting. Make a greater effort to share ideas and feelings. Cultivate patience.

THE WEEK OF INTENSITY
SCORPIO I

A Mission Improbable

This relationship is unstable, fluctuating and full of tension. At work, Scorpio I's may have little respect for the goal-oriented drives of Aries II's, which they can see as blind or even mindless. If principles stand between an Aries II and success, they will often go out the window, and this Scorpio I's cannot abide. Moreover, should an Aries II justify an action by pleading forgetfulness or claiming that he or she was misinformed, the Scorpio I demand for truthfulness will begin to glow red. It will be hard for Scorpio I's to believe that what they view as oversights, miscalculations or slights on the part of an Aries II were not deliberate, no matter how innocent or uncalculating these seem to others.

As a love affair, the relationship can be intense, but also painful and uncertain. Scorpio I's generally don't easily let go of those they love. Aries II's, on the other hand, must be free to do their thing, and won't hesitate to abandon a relationship if they feel it is counterproductive or unrealistic. Should their sexual involvement be deep enough, however, they may find themselves trapped and in certain situations at the mercy of a controlling Scorpio I, causing them great anguish and frustration. In such a situation an Aries II may have a need to serve the Scorpio II, yet may dread doing so, even while deriving great pleasure from the relationship.

As friends, these two may have fallings out over broken promises, missed appointments or unkept commitments, but the good humor and fun times they share can outweigh this downside of their relationship. Aries II's greatly enjoy Scorpio I's sense of humor, and can even stand to have it directed against them, as long as they know that their friend really cares about them. Scorpio I's will rarely betray the trust of Aries II's, but will make extremely exacting demands of them. As siblings, similarly, the pair can go through a lot together emotionally, and can maintain a close bond of mutual respect, despite tremendous rivalries and differences.

ADVICE: Understanding and forgiveness are closely related—develop both. Let go of claims. Beware of power struggles. Work on accepting differences.

THE WEEK OF DEPTH

Stormy Weather

This relationship tends to be highly problematic. While it offers quite a bit of magnetic fascination, hidden insecurities are likely to rise to the surface in this combination. As a result, the relationship is apt to swing back and forth between attraction and insecurity, in a frustrating kind of dance.

Both Aries II's and Scorpio II's are jealous types who demand to be the main object of their lover's or spouse's attention. They may arouse a storm of emotions in each other, particularly in the sexual sphere, and while their relationship may be swept by ecstatic passion, it may also involve possessiveness, dislike—even violence. A love affair between these two can be an emotional growth experience for Aries II's, putting them in touch with a welter of hitherto untouched or unknown sources of imagination and feeling. Unfortunately, a breakup of the relationship can be highly negative, resulting in hatred and vengeful behavior unless the partners make an effort to handle each other with respect and love.

Although Scorpio II's are highly controlling, they may have difficulty reigning in the excessive aspects of the Aries II character. In the area of finances, for example, Scorpio II's may find Aries II's overlavish in their expenditures, even fiscally irresponsible. On the other hand, Scorpio II's themselves don't hesitate to spend money on themselves or on their interests, so Aries II's may feel victimized by a double standard. The fact that Scorpio II's are worriers and Aries II's are not only exacerbates this tension.

The relationship does best, perhaps, as a friendship, since a Scorpio II is better able to share an Aries II friend than an Aries II lover with others. Aries II's will enjoy the depth and intensity of Scorpio II's when the two of them share challenging physical activities. Scorpio II seriousness may at times weigh on the more happy-go-lucky Aries II, but will also lend purpose to Aries II efforts. Aries II–Scorpio II siblings, particularly of the same sex, will often have a colorful and volatile relationship that sometimes appears to be a true friendship. Such a relationship adds spice to family life, but can also disturb its tranquility.

ADVICE: Emotional upset can be a learning experience, but don't take it too far. Act responsibly. Beware of double standards. Respond to challenges.

THE WEEK OF CHARM

Conscious Camouflage

This polarized relationship often presents a calm, unemotional, perhaps even gay and carefree face to the world, but hides a dark, volatile side. This act of camouflage and concealment is often quite studied and conscious; some very private goals are being assiduously worked on far from the public eye in this relationship. As a pair, these two want to be taken seriously. They are finely attuned to each other, which also means they can push each other's buttons at will, particularly in love relationships. Great trust and honesty will have to develop here if any kind of stability is to be achieved. Through this relationship, however, both partners can go far in developing their own strengths and abilities.

The desire of Aries II's to dominate and control comes to the fore in their personal relationships with Scorpio III's. Unfortunately for them, Scorpio III's are tough customers who cannot take orders blindly, and will not hesitate to give up a relationship that is unduly negative or unproductive. Thus Aries II's who cannot back off may be sowing the seeds of their own undoing. At the same time, though, a healthy amount of aggression is needed to penetrate Scorpio III defenses, and Aries II's may know exactly how far to go in disturbing Scorpio III composure on first meeting. Such encounters may lead these two to become acquaintances, companions and finally fast friends. Aries II's may be incapable of understanding Scorpio III's at a deep emotional level, but they have an intuitive understanding of Scorpio III needs, and know how to treat them in most situations. Because Scorpio III's may choose to live alone, giving up the benefits of life with a lover or family, they value friends highly, and perhaps none more so than Aries II's.

In a boss-employee relationship, Scorpio III's will generally make the better boss, but often also the better employee. The Aries II need to be the center of attention usually gels poorly with the purposeful, realistic and efficient work attitudes of Scorpio III's. In parent-child relationships, Scorpio III children may feel misunderstood, neglected or mistreated by Aries II parents, feelings that usually persist into adult life.

ADVICE: Strive for openness and honesty. Learn when to back off. Keep aggressive impulses under control. Don't be afraid to show yourself.

Controlled Evolution

This relationship often progresses from a brilliant and precocious beginning to a sense of boredom and a yearning for freedom from the rigors and exigencies of everyday life. It is a relationship that demands a great deal of inventiveness and free-spirited play if it is to last. Traditional concepts of commitment will not work here.

Aries II's and Scorpio-Sagittarians who form a solid friendship are better off not allowing their relationship to evolve in a more personal, physical or romantic direction, when it can turn combative. (The people who get closest to Aries II's are often advisors or friends rather than lovers or spouses.) Aries II's may lack the sensitivity to form a deep emotional bond with Scorpio-Sagittarians, who may become frustrated with Aries II selfishness and self-centeredness. But Scorpio-Sagittarians may also admire Aries II directedness, particularly in the professional sphere. In this respect Aries II's can help Scorpio-Sagittarians by teaching them, through example, how to further their careers. Aries II ambition often strikes a responsive chord in Scorpio-Sagittarians, and Aries II energy may be just the career catalyst a Scorpio-Sagittarius needs.

Marriages between these two are not strongly advised, because of the problem of boredom, but they can work out fine, particularly when built on a solid financial partnership. Both parties know something about power, and may enjoy sharing it in the form of money or property. There is more than a bit of the aristocrat in many Aries II's and Scorpio-Sagittarians, who are united by common admiration of a sophisticated lifestyle. Variety, and deliberate restraint of a tendency to tie each other down, are very much key here. Money can help, allowing travel and other pursuits that can give the marriage a sense of freedom. Business partnerships between these two can work out even better than marriages, as long as disturbing emotional elements are kept under control. The loyalty and protectiveness of Scorpio-Sagittarius parents may create a suitable environment for the development of an Aries II child, as long as their autocratic tendencies don't arouse rebellion.

ADVICE: Knowing when to stop is a sign of wisdom. Be critical of plans to expand. Keep drives for power under control. Share openness and honesty.

SAGITTARIUS I

Dynamic Balance

This relationship must consciously strive to achieve a dynamic balance between high energy levels. Although well suited to each other in their mutual zest for life and need for independence, this duo will have important differences in outlook that can strain their relationship. Even so, this combination can be faithful, directed, upbeat, successful and, as lovers, romantic.

The relationship will do best if it emphasizes what the partners have in common (a general outlook) rather than their differences (in approach). For one thing, Aries II's are generally more ambitious than Sagittarius I's, whom they may find curiously passive at times in career matters. Conversely, Sagittarius I's have a strong ethical code, and can find serious fault with the Aries II desire to get ahead at any cost. Should Aries II's indulge in amoral or outright immoral behavior, Sagittarius I's may be disapproving or judgmental, and in extreme cases will abruptly end the relationship.

These personalities are highly compatible in marriage, but their love affairs run the risk of early burnout, so it's best for them to try to take things slowly—no easy task for these two! Friendships can develop easily here, and since same-sex Aries II's and Sagittarius I's make not only good partners for each other but also challenging adversaries, they may build a dynamic balance around sports or other competitive activities.

In the workplace and at home, this combination interacts intensely with co-workers and family members. But its need to be at the center of things and its competitive nature can lead to disturbing conflicts, regardless of how stimulating it may be in furthering group action. Sagittarius I's will generally make better bosses or parents for Aries II's than the other way around; an Aries II as boss will have an inflexible resolve to achieve concrete results, which may collide with the Sagittarius I requirement of fairness and independence. When young, these two can make excellent and stimulating playmates for each other, either within or outside a family setting.

ADVICE: Friction can spark fire, but also just a lot of smoke. Direct your energies. Try to find the middle ground between results and ethics.

Congenial Camaraderie

This classic trine configuration (120° apart in the zodiac) augurs well for an amiable relationship, and indeed the focus of this combination can be an easy camaraderie, with few problems dotting the landscape. Although Aries II–Sagittarius II friendships may be as close and rewarding as any in the year, however, in the areas of love and marriage this relationship can encounter substantial problems, although in no way insurmountable ones. The main issue between these parties is that they both have their own way of doing things, and since neither of them is particularly accepting or understanding, conflicts result.

Both Aries II's and Sagittarius II's are often hard-driving, ambitious individuals, and this doesn't always make it easy for them to collaborate in the workplace, unless they are willing to subordinate their individuality to a higher cause. As siblings, co-workers or mates, they may be excessively competitive, threatening both the happiness they both desire and the stability of their work or family group. They operate most easily together if they are of the opposite sex, when a curious psychic chemistry may evolve between siblings or co-workers in this combination, making the relationship manifest as a single, dynamic and productive force.

Often physically attracted to each other, these two can enjoy a blossoming romance. Sagittarius II's are prone to hero worship, and it will please Aries II's to become the object of such adoration. Unfortunately, Sagittarius II's are often unrealistic in their partner choices, and run the risk of being hurt or rejected by Aries II's, who may not share their depth of passion and can be amoral or manipulative in pursuit of fleeting pleasures.

Although fulfilling marriages and friendships are often found in this combination, friendships are more likely to survive the heat generated by these fiery individuals. In marriage, conflicts over children, property and finances are likely to disturb domestic tranquillity. A free and easygoing camaraderie with few demands and lots of space for independent action is more congenial to both parties.

ADVICE: Compromise when necessary. Try to see the larger picture. Don't let emotions get too heavy. Maintain independence. Keep it light and easy.

Coming Out on Top

Power struggles are likely to emerge in this relationship over who is to be the leader. More than most combinations, the relationship will also need to star in its own personal drama, but it will be hard for either of these two to take a back seat, whether to the partnership or to each other. Aries II's have trouble subordinating themselves to a more powerful personality, but this is precisely what Sagittarius III's usually require. Yet Sagittarius III's can become so enchanted with Aries II's that they will sometimes let their guard down, virtually gaping open-mouthed in awe or admiration. Also, certain Aries II's may be able to assume a secondary position to Sagittarius III's, as long as their central, indispensable role in the family or company is not threatened or questioned.

Once the first blush of passion has passed in a love affair between these two, Sagittarius III's may begin to turn the screws in their need for control. They should realize that this can only end in disaster, and should try to be more sensitive to the Aries II need for independence of thought and action. On the other hand, Aries II's are capable of feigning submissiveness while actually keeping control through subtle manipulation. They are well acquainted with the brand of egotism that feeds off the attention of others, and can alternately give and withhold energy with their Sagittarius III partners to telling effect. Friendship between members of the same sex may not be possible in this combination, since both partners need to share the spotlight in their social circle. And should they try to restrict their friendship to themselves alone, one or the other of them may prove unwilling or unable to share or reciprocate. Marriages between these two may suffer for the same reason, although the pressure of daily responsibilities can force the recalcitrant partner to act responsibly.

Business or other working partnerships between these two are not always a good bet. Ambitious and goal-oriented impulses may sometimes unite them, sometimes divide them, but in either event fiscal irresponsibility and lack of patience for mundane details must be overcome.

ADVICE: Give up the spotlight occasionally. Let others shine too. Anonymity has its benefits. Be responsible about money. Learn to share.

THE CUSP OF PROPHECY
 SAGITTARIUS-CAPRICORN CUSP

Tongue and Groove

The crucial question here is whether the partners can accept each other without irritation or blame. Their differences are severe: Sagittarius-Capricorns are usually far too serious for Aries II's, who are exuberant and direct—qualities likely to get on the nerves of a secretive, emotionally complex partner. Sagittarius-Capricorns are sensitive to the profundity and significance of life's trials and tribulations, while the more carefree Aries II's would rather not confront or even think about them. Sagittarius-Capricorns may consequently see the Aries II lifestyle as trivializing all they hold dear. Luckily, this relationship holds something of value for both partners, including a built-in open-mindedness. The Sagittarius-Capricorn moral consciousness may just keep Aries II's in line, while Sagittarius-Capricorns for their part will be lighter than usual in this relationship, as its colorful, fun-loving orientation offsets their weightiness. The key may be the way each partner benefits from the strengths that the other provides.

Differences in tempo and tone can create tension when a deep Sagittarius-Capricorn and an impulsive Aries II are lovers or spouses. On the upside, the earthy qualities of Sagittarius-Capricorns can offer stability to the union, despite undermining influences from mutual fire. (Both Sagittarius and Aries are fire signs.) On the downside, the couple may periodically be swept away by destructive, albeit enthusiastic impulses, particularly in the financial sphere.

Aries II friends may be just what Sagittarius-Capricorns need to pull them out of their darker moods and spur them to action. Similarly, Aries II siblings or parents lend color and excitement to their surroundings, which can disturb Sagittarius-Capricorn concentration but can also make them more attentive to the present moment. Sagittarius-Capricorn parents tend to keep an eye on the future, a quality often sorely needed by impulsive Aries II children. In family situations, then, the relationship will provide compensation for each partner's deficiencies and allow their needs to be satisfied.

Repressed Desires

The strong and silent face that this relationship may present to the world belies the burning sense of often frustrated ambition that it carries within. Hidden and repressed desires, and their exposure, are the keynotes here: each partner will nurture a concealed desire to be the leader, either within the relationship or in the world at large, yet each is likely to subsume this urge for the relationship's sake. Even so, whether at work or at home, the relationship can be complementary as well as inhibiting, with the Capricorn I bringing needed structure and planning to any undertaking, and the Aries II contributing drive and charisma.

An Aries II's ambition and drive can be suppressed in a matchup with a Capricorn I, who will usually be more insecure, and will more easily get stuck in a lesser position. If so, the relationship may not allow the Aries II, whether as a co-worker or a family member, to surpass his or her partner. In addition, Capricorn I's are likely to see Aries II lovers and mates as selfish, egotistical and unwilling to assume the responsibilities of everyday life in a practical or efficient enough way. Aries II's are actually quite capable of sacrificing their desires in service of a higher goal, whether it be a marriage, family or love, so it will annoy them to be accused of inefficiency or self-centeredness by a Capricorn I. The mixture of Capricorn earthiness and Aries fire may presage an ardent, at times even feverish love affair that offers little rest or tranquillity to either partner. Sex and love addictions must be guarded against; they can turn into a dark passion that is mutually consuming and destructive. Friendships between these two can be more stable and beneficial, although less exciting, and a business connection between equals may prove the best bet of all. At work, each partner can provide what the other lacks; as long as they keep personality clashes to a minimum, they can build a formula for success. Aries II bosses, however, may see the Capricorn I lack of initiative as evidence of lethargy or complacency. And Capricorn I bosses, or for that matter parents, may express their authoritative nature in ways that Aries II's will experience as highly oppressive. The intense Aries II need for freedom is likely to chafe under Capricorn I rules and restraints.

ADVICE: Differences can unite as well as divide. Minimize competition and jealousy. Allow personal expression. Beware of addictive tendencies.

Breaking Down Walls

Conventional astrology predicts a rocky road for those whose suns are square to each other (approximately 90° apart in the zodiac), which is the case with the Capricorn II–Aries II combination. Some believe such relationships should be avoided if possible, and many walls to intimacy will indeed have to be broken down, and personal defenses breached, if this relationship is to succeed. As a result, the relationship has an oddly prickly side, a sore spot, if you will, which, if pressed, can cause flare-ups of tension.

In love and marriage, striving rather than strife should be the keyword here. If both partners keep their respect for each other, they may spur each other on to new levels of sensitivity and awareness. Capricorn II's will enjoy having a highly independent partner, and Aries II fits the bill nicely. But independent though Aries II's are, they also need attention and to be needed, and this particular desire may not be filled by a Capricorn II, who may often be away from home, whether at work or socializing with friends.

At work, Capricorn II's certainly meet their match in Aries II's. These two can be excellent business partners, but by the same token they also make challenging competitors and formidable adversaries. Being co-workers at the same job level is not recommended for them, in fact, since each will tend to struggle to get ahead at the other's expense. When it comes to career, neither of these two is above taking unfair advantage of a situation to further their cause, and in a business dispute where there can only be one winner, neither will surrender without a fight.

In a marriage, this kind of contentiousness may actually advance the relationship's longevity, since both parties hate to admit failure. Even the most combative of marital relationships, then, may go on for years. As siblings or parent-child duos, Capricorn II's and Aries II's are likely to fall into predictable patterns of bickering, strife or in extreme cases all-out combat.

ADVICE: Why are your enemies hard to overcome? Perhaps the answer lies in yourself. Try to achieve the best in yourself. Uncover points of sensitivity.

Flexible Structures

This relationship will be much concerned with uncovering or identifying the structures hidden within it, such as daily routines, rules of morality or unspoken agreements. It will work most easily when its activities and attitudes are flexibly structured, and love relationships may consequently prove difficult here, since moral expectations are likely to be rigid in this combination; if the tensions this causes can be survived, however, this kind of strictness can actually be a benefit to marital relationships. In any area, the Capricorn III tendency to dominate may meet with stiff resistance from Aries II's, who don't like being controlled and are bound to rebel against the structures this relationship throws up. On the other hand, Capricorn III's are prone to hero worship (usually a holdover from childhood), and if they come to idolize an Aries II Star, they may prove less rigid. An adored Aries II, meanwhile, may be willing to endure a few rules.

Friendships between these two can be magnificent. Sharing, mutual ego-support and an extroverted stance are characteristic of this nonthreatening relationship. Capricorn III's are highly physical, and an Aries II may prove the perfect companion for them in activities ranging from sport and fitness to adventure. Both parties like pushing limits, whether their own or the record book's. Such rolling back of existing structures gives the relationship both form and an outlet. The danger here may be a propensity to get into trouble, particularly with authority figures or the law.

Working together, whether as co-workers or a boss-employee pair, is not favored for these two, particularly if the Capricorn III is especially unyielding. An Aries II child will often have to struggle to get out from under an older Capricorn III sibling, especially one of the same sex, but if structural modifications in the relationship occur as a result, they will generally prove beneficial.

ADVICE: Beware of the lure of danger. Breaking the law can become a bad habit. Push physical limits, not moral ones. Make rules flexible. Avoid rigidity of thought.

THE CUSP OF MYSTERY & IMAGINATION

Few Dull Moments

This relationship is likely to be lively and high spirited. The matchup works particularly well in marriage, promising an interesting and successful shared life. Neither party necessarily makes this stable a marriage with personalities of other weeks in the year, so that this is a somewhat unique relationship for these two, a niche of permanence and security. There is rarely a dull moment in an Aries II-Capricorn-Aquarius home. The latter's love of practical jokes will find an appreciative audience in Aries II's, even when they are the object of their spouse's lighthearted forays. Both these partners enjoy family get-togethers, parties and celebrations. Should they have children together, they are likely to furnish a warm and loving environment.

Even in the midst of such domestic tranquillity there will be a few problems, particularly involving excessive spending. Emotional upheavals arising from the cyclic mood swings of Capricorn-Aquarians can also be disruptive and disturbing. Fits of temper may prove even more upsetting in love affairs between this two, since both are hot tempered to begin with, and passionate or unstable feelings here can be like gasoline on a fire. Indeed, when an affair between these two goes wrong, particularly a hidden or illicit one, the whole relationship may go up dramatically in flames.

It will be difficult for these two to stay friends after a breakup. Friendships without a history of close personal or physical involvement may likewise not last, for they may involve a high frustration level, or a strain in maintaining objectivity. On the other hand, Aries II-Capricorn-Aquarius co-workers can build a solid relationship around mutual responsibility, respect and hard work. Working side by side, whether as spouses or career associates, is a fine way for these two to get to know each other and to build the trust necessary to sustain their relationship. As siblings, however, they may not get along at all, due to mutual irritations and antagonisms.

ADVICE: Try to keep mood swings and high spirits under control. Build honesty and trust. Stick to a well-planned budget. Minimize irritations.

Burning Bridges

At the heart of this relationship lies a permissive attitude that not only allows but demands freedom, probably undermining any attempt to build on the kind of solid foundation that can bring longevity and happiness. Undercutting its own efforts, the relationship recalls the image of the man who burns his bridges behind him—often including, unfortunately, the very bridge he is standing on at the time. The question here is whether the combination's positive aspects (excitement, dynamism, impulsiveness) will fortify the relationship or run out of control. If the latter, the relationship will self-destruct. And even at best, positive and negative are so intimately related here that a wild and colorful relationship, without a whole lot of stability, is in the cards.

The relationship's highs are heavenly, its depths abysmal. Particularly in love affairs, ecstatic climaxes will do little to make either partner feel secure. This is one of those relationships motivated more by want than by need, and it will continue only as long as both parties desire each other. One unfavorable incident may be enough to discourage these fair-weather lovers. For the same reasons, marriages in this combination are unlikely to endure until death do them part, so that it may be wise for them to live together on a trial basis before naming a wedding day. In exceptional cases a free or open marriage may bring a measure of longevity to the relationship, but even so, this couple should think carefully before having children.

The levels of stress and impatience, and the lack of even moderate behavior in a pairing of these two personalities, rule out most working situations. As friends or family members, Aries II's and Aquarius I's combine their fiery and airy qualities in an explosive mixture that at once furthers the action and periodically disrupts its progress. As long as neither partner taps into the other's dark side, sibling and parent-child combinations may avoid violent confrontations, but triggering mechanisms and psychological projections guarantee that at any moment things may start teetering precariously on the edge of a new calamity.

ADVICE: Pushing buttons is easy, keeping your hands off is not. Make things easier, not harder. Minimize stress. Cultivate stability. Moderation is key.

Few Antipathies

This highly personal relationship stresses enjoyment unmarred by heavy or messy emotional entanglements. Interestingly, though, both of these personalities enjoy socializing within the relationship, so that they spend quite a bit of time alone together—so much so that the pairing can prove a little limiting, and they may end up bored.

Although objectively well suited to Aries II's as friends, lovers, mates or family members, Aquarius II's are often attracted to more troubled and, in their eyes, more exciting personalities, perhaps representing their own shadow side, so that they may not think an Aries II fits the bill at all. Consequently, although friendships and love between these two can be easy and fun, the magnetic attraction here may not be strong enough to keep Aquarius II's from detaching and moving on. Similarly, marriages between Aries II's and Aquarius II's don't usually involve deep sexual or romantic ties. On the other hand, a shared love of travel, entertainment, decorating or pets may far outlive either of these personality's passionate involvement with a person from another week of the year. An easy lifestyle, replete with the best that life has to offer, may be in store for this pair.

Since there is a trepidation here about deep romantic involvements, friendships involving shared social activities, perhaps involving clubs, or physical endeavors such as team sports, are perhaps the best bet. This is one of those rare combinations that can enjoy both working together and playing together regularly after work. In fact, remarkably few antipathies or points of irritation will generally surface in this relationship to drive its partners apart. Much more likely is a sense of loneliness when the partners are together that would cause them to look elsewhere for more meaningful connections. Aries II–Aquarius II siblings are often very close when growing up, and may room together while in school, or while working as young professionals. As long as financial matters and an equitable division of labor can be worked out, this combination may live together in harmony for many years, even as a parent-child relationship that lasts far beyond adolescence.

ADVICE: Get tougher. Learn to take the bad with the good. Push a bit harder to achieve. Beware of complacency and dependency.

A New Set of Buttons

The focus of this relationship can be a preoccupation with literal interpretations and a refusal to let go of troublesome details. This explosive combination of fire (Aries) and air (Aquarius) is prone to anger and irritation, but on a good day storm clouds will pass quickly and arguments or unfair remarks will soon be forgotten. Irritability is the most common problem in this pairing, so that if these two are to get along, either or both of them should toughen up, maybe growing a whole new set of buttons that can't be pushed so easily. Arguments that start over picky details can escalate to enormous proportions, threatening the very existence of a marriage, friendship or love relationship, so it is always best to stamp them out in their earliest stages.

Because Aquarius III's so value open and natural behavior, they may resent the attention that others pay to Aries II Stars. Such resentment can erode friendships and arouse acute jealousy in love relationships. Aquarius III insecurities may emerge if an Aries II partner or spouse is the object of too much attention from members of the opposite sex. Aquarius III's must learn to balance their emotions, be less reactive and perhaps be proud that so many see their mate as so desirable.

As children, Aquarius III's are often accepting and impressionable, so they may be influenced by or idolize an Aries II Star, particularly if there's one in the family. Such attachments often end in disillusion, since Aries II's will find it as hard as anyone else will to live up to Aquarius III expectations. Similar patterns can emerge when these two are adults, with Aries II's enjoying but also at times regretting Aquarius III attention. When the combination does not come about by choice, as in a family or work situation, bickering may get out of hand, and the pair would be better off separated.

ADVICE: Be less reactive. Overlook small hurts. Try to see the big picture. Don't take things too literally. Not every remark is personal.

AQUARIUS-PISCES CUSP

Bonds of Imagination

Rooted in fantasy and the spiritual, this relationship may be out of touch with everyday realities. It will be essential for its partners to work on objectivity, then, since romance or illusion may threaten to sweep them away.

A problem can materialize in love affairs when a sensitive Aquarius-Pisces, trying to express care and sympathy for an Aries II, encounters storms of passion and desire in return. This difference in style can cause mutual frustration. But the aggressiveness of an Aries II friend or lover may simply embody the other side of Aquarius-Pisces' sensitive and passive psyche, a more passionate side of which they only dreamed.

Marriages between these two, whether or not influenced by childhood role models, may be good and in certain cases magnificent. Both Pisces-Aquarians and Aries II's can have trouble opening up at a deep level, and the happy domestic situation they can achieve in this relationship may serve as the best therapy imaginable. An idyllic family life is possible here, with children and pets enriching and securing the adults' love. One warning: should either partner betray the other's trust, breaking the couple up, it may be a long time before the wronged party will be ready to reembar on the path of matrimony—if ever.

Siblings in this combination can be extremely close in childhood. An Aries II or Pisces-Aquarius brother or sister will often serve as a role model in the adult sibling's search for a spouse or living partner. As co-workers, Aries II's and Pisces-Aquarians may get along all too well, so that their strong bonds of imagination and emotion interfere with the work at hand. These two may have to struggle to stay on track and get their tasks done.

ADVICE: Trust is at least as important as desire. Try to see things as they are. Seek your own path. Don't define yourself in terms of others.

Awakening

This relationship shows how very different individuals may have a positive effect on each other by bringing out dormant qualities that might otherwise go unexpressed. The central image here is that of rebirth: the relationship awakens long-forgotten individual characteristics and allows them creative expression. Aries II's, for example, tend to be more bound up with their sense of self than with the problems and concerns of others, but they have the capacity, often ignored, of giving themselves wholeheartedly to a cause. Pisces I's, on the other hand, are devotional types who often have difficulties with self-definition and tend to slip into the background around others. Together in a joint endeavor, they can lead the way in a cause involving service and social or spiritual reawakening.

A common goal can serve as the driving force behind this relationship, and the areas of common interest and emotional expression that it opens up can lead to friendship, love or marriage. The emotionality of Pisces I's may reawaken deep feelings in Aries II, while the driving ambition of Aries II's may serve as a model for Pisces I's who are a bit adrift or misdirected careerwise. There may be problems in love relationships between these two: Pisces I's can despair over the Aries II inability to express feelings or to show understanding and empathy, while Aries II's sometimes find Pisces I's needy and clinging. Since Aries II's must feel free to make their own decisions, this relationship is often short-lived.

Longevity is more likely in marriage here. Over the years, these two may compensate for each other's deficiencies, and can periodically breathe new life into their marriage. As family members, they may both want to improve the well-being of the domestic unit, particularly if it is a disadvantaged one, and may be united in this common interest.

ADVICE: Use differences to advantage. Beware of condemning attitudes. Develop patience and understanding. Every now and then, start all over again.

A Love of Beauty

This relationship often centers around aesthetic experience, especially music, theater, art and design. Sharing likes and dislikes and exploring questions of taste together are among this combination's greatest joys. When these two are mates or friends, Aries II's may also crave the Pisces II gift of intimacy after a hard day of tilting at windmills. Outwardly directed, they rarely have the time or the talent to switch their minds off their principal activities, whether professional or domestic, and Pisces II's have the ability to lead them through intriguing byways of human experience, far removed from everyday concerns.

The relationship can manifest as a fruitful but unusual marriage. The world may be amazed that such unlike people can be successful together, but the Pisces II capacity for profound thought, planning and evaluation may prove a reassuring and directing influence on the spontaneous, dynamic energies of Aries II's. Also, when Pisces II's sink into depression, as they sometimes do, the positive outlook of Aries II's may prove indispensable. And both these partners will be able to learn to stand aside rather than intrude on the other's moods.

Nevertheless, many Pisces II's will not initially be attracted to Aries II's, whose loud, outgoing and egotistical nature will often turn them off. And Aries II's may find the inwardness of most Pisces II's, although intriguing, still far too strange to get involved with. Acquaintanceships or partnerships in activities involving aesthetic matters or physical grace may be the closest these two care to get to each other.

Pisces II's are rarely hard driving enough to keep up with Aries II's at work. Their moodiness may also be counterproductive to getting the job done on schedule, which ambitious Aries II's will not appreciate. As parents, these personalities reinforce each other's tendency to be too self-centered to give children the attention they need.

ADVICE: Develop your love of beauty. Make time available to help others. Beware of self-centeredness. Fight a tendency to moodiness.

Needing to Be Needed

This relationship will be oriented toward fulfilling individual needs and providing nurturing, help and understanding. Both of these individuals need to be needed, but in different ways; their ability to create a long-lasting relationship will depend on how capable each of them is of filling the other's needs, and how deep those needs go.

Aries II's usually like accomplishing tasks for others, thereby allowing themselves to feel indispensable. With a Pisces III partner, they are apt to emphasize their own necessity by pointing out how unrealistic, unambitious and impractical that partner is, though this is often not the case. This may wound the soulful and romantic Pisces III, who, though appreciating Aries II capability and decisiveness, will feel unacknowledged. Pisces III's need to be needed emotionally, something to which Aries II would never admit. These two must become more fully aware of their different ways of showing love, and to accept that not all their needs can be filled. It may be wise for them to realize that their differences here lie in style, not in intention.

When this pair are friends and colleagues, the philosophical side of the Pisces III is unlikely to be appreciated by the Aries II, who is likely to be geared more to action than to speculation. Unless they share a common activity or pursuit, then, they probably won't grow close. The Pisces III mind must roam over the broad arena of human existence, plumbing the depths of our theories and beliefs about ourselves. Aries II's are more concerned with the here and now. To them, and to their disappointment, their Pisces III companions often sell themselves short in terms of personal goals they could attain. Aries II parents, then, can be very hard on their Pisces III children, whom they may see as underachievers. These two may succeed, however, in heading up a business, social organization or work team, in which Pisces III does the planning and idea work and Aries II is concerned with implementation.

ADVICE: Would you rather be alone? Appreciate what you have while you have it. Open lines of sympathy and empathy. Wants are as important as needs.

Constant Struggle

The prevailing theme in this relationship may unfortunately be frustration, for in many areas of life this is not a realistic combination. Aries III's are usually engaged in doing things with and for other people—planning, organizing, executing, maintaining—but can rarely allow others to do anything for them. One can expect quite a bit of struggle in this relationship, then, over who will do what. On the upside, these two are sure to attract a constant stream of people coming and going, and this kind of activity may be enough to keep them both satisfied.

Two Aries III's living together or in a love affair may experience impossible difficulties in the long run. Usually guided by fixed ideas and ideologies, they may engage in a constant struggle for supremacy, unless they have exactly or at least close to the same viewpoint. They should really get involved with personalities other than their own, with people who have other needs for their strengths to fill. Things can be extremely difficult for children exposed to the conflict within an Aries III–Aries III marriage, and even worse for them in the "perfect" situation of both parents sharing the same beliefs, when they will be expected to measure up to a monolithic set of standards with no chance of appeal to another point of view.

Friendships and family relationships between Aries III's are likely to suffer from ideological conflicts, but if at least one of the partners is diplomatic, as these personalities are likely to be, there may be an equitable give-and-take of ideas and energies. Because Aries III's have well-developed social skills and need a lot of social interaction, they are likely to see eye-to-eye on the need to contribute to the welfare of others. Sharp disagreements can break out as to how and when such contributions are to be made, but these differences can be worked out if mutual goals are kept in sight. As co-workers, two Aries III's can get a tremendous amount done and achieve success in a wide variety of endeavors as long as they can keep their need to dominate under control. Their innate sense of fairness and their sensitivity to the good of the group will help to make this possible.

ADVICE: Keep your ideas under control. Practice flexibility. Avoid a monolithic stance. Get enough rest. Hard work isn't always required.

A Stimulating Rivalry

This matchup is often highly dramatic and critical. Both Aries III's and Aries-Tauruses are willful, strong-minded individuals, and their relationship magnifies those characteristics to such a degree that they may argue about how almost anything is to be done. But the combination is a powerful one if unified and outwardly directed, so that its abilities both to attack and to defend may guarantee the safety and security of those around it, whether family members or co-workers. As individuals, Aries-Tauruses and Aries III's make fearsome rivals in matters of career and love, and since neither is quick to admit defeat, their sharp verbal combat can be prolonged and damaging.

Both these personalities are highly physical, and their love affairs are likely to be intense indeed, particularly sexually. Aries III's tend to deny their emotions, but with an Aries-Taurus they can exhibit rather theatrical expressions of feeling. And while Aries-Tauruses can be terrible procrastinators, this relationship's critical attitudes and dramatic displays may have the effect of goading these recalcitrant personalities into motion.

Friendships between these two are a good bet. Both parties are usually responsible in discharging their duties as friends. Extremely capable, they can both be counted on in joint activities—making travel arrangements, reservations, payments (perhaps a tad late, however), or seeing that a rented car is returned in at least as good shape as it was delivered. Aries III's have more of a need for physical activity, and the chemistry here can be catalytic for Aries-Tauruses: usually content to relax on the beach, they may instead be miraculously stimulated to scuba dive, hang-glide or mountain-climb. The relationship may also have the effect of encouraging Aries III's to be more openly affectionate and appreciative than usual.

ADVICE: Being able to admit weakness may be a sign of strength. Don't question everything. Learn to relax. Empty out—so you can recharge.

Eat-to-Live Versus Live-to-Eat

This relationship could furnish the material for a whole textbook on power. Although both Aries III's and Taurus I's are highly dominant types, they express this dominance very differently: Aries III's are turned on by the kick of leading others, and of moving out into the world, while Taurus I's can be quite content to sit at home or in the office as long as they know that other people are implementing their ideas. In both cases, however, ruling the roost is a firm requirement, which can make a marriage or other permanent living situation between these two difficult or impossible. They may avoid conflict if they can negotiate a strict separation of duties and spheres of influence within the family or group, but it will be difficult.

To cite one example: food. What Taurus I's eat is very important to them, and many of them have a great fondness for cooking. Aries III's, on the other hand, are liable to eat whatever is there, using food simply as fuel. It might be said that Aries III's eat to live while Taurus I's live to eat. Also important to Taurus I's are other kinds of creature comfort, particularly home furnishings, which may not matter much to adventuresome Aries III's. Serious power struggles arise when Aries III's insist that quality food and furnishings are items that those they live with can and should be able to do without.

Their physical stamina and their devotion to ideas aside, Aries III's and Taurus I's may have little to share in a love relationship or marriage. As friends, Taurus I's have a need to express sympathy and affection, while Aries III's may play it cooler and try to keep their emotions under control (though not without occasional flare-ups). Friendships between these two are often built around involvements with social, community and family institutions, for neither party likes to be alone for very long.

ADVICE: Givers must learn to be takers. Accepting help doesn't make you weaker. Power tripping can be a waste of time and energy. Chill.

Lofty Ideals

The basis of this relationship can be an intense interest in social equality, supported by firm ideals and high ethical standards. Both Aries III's and Taurus II's have strong feelings of responsibility toward their fellow human beings, and are fair and responsive in their daily relations with others. Both dislike discrimination in any form. Their relationship, then, will often assume a role as protector of the weak and poor. Philanthropic or socially concerned organizations will benefit from the efforts of this combination, which may also prove an excellent matchup for heading up a business or social group.

Friendships are likely to work well here, with relatively few problems. But it doesn't necessarily follow that romantic or sexual feelings between Aries III's and Taurus II's will develop into a love affair. Both of these personalities are most often passionately drawn to people far different from themselves—particularly people who are disadvantaged, unusual or exotic, or from widely divergent racial, social or national backgrounds.

The Aries III–Taurus II matchup can make for an excellent marriage as long as the partners don't feel that they are compromising their lofty ideals. They may well have children, who will grow up in an environment of tolerance and high standards, but both parents must be careful not to inflict their principles too strictly on their offspring, who may be frustrated and rebellious unless they feel free to make their own choices. In their concern for people outside the family, moreover, these two should take care not to neglect their own children's emotional needs.

Aries III–Taurus II siblings can contribute greatly to their family's stability and happiness. A parent-child relationship in this combination may be built on strong mutual respect, with an emphasis on trust and character that can continue well into adult life. The only danger here is excessive dependency or hero worship, which will bind children to parents and slow their growth and maturity.

ADVICE: High moral standards are sometimes best suppressed to allow for individual expression. Avoid condemning attitudes. Don't neglect feelings.

Establishing a Focus

A determining issue in this relationship is whether it can establish a basis of stability and focus. Although focused ambition is generally not a hallmark of either of these personalities individually, together they have an ability to make their dreams happen. To do so, however, they have to overcome the differences in their outlooks and agree. Not that they argue and fight; it's just that it's hard for them to find goals that are equally important to both of them. Once they do, it is surprisingly easy for them to achieve success.

As friends and lovers, Aries III's and Taurus III's can have great times. They both have a sense of humor and love group activities, and their relationship can be exciting, vibrant, and colorful. Aries III's must be careful, however, not to be put in the position of giving too much, sacrificing their own comfort to a more irresponsible Taurus III partner. An Aries III–Taurus III marriage can have trouble attaining stability; differences in values, goals and philosophy can prove divisive and prohibitive. One solution can be a free or open marriage in which each party pursues his or her own idiosyncratic lifestyle, committing to the form of marriage without accepting its limitations.

In the family sphere there may be problems. Taurus III children can tire of an Aries III parent's ideologies and strange ideas, for these natural individuals above all need to be themselves and to follow their spontaneous urges, no matter how outrageous. Likewise, Aries III children may not get the security and consistency they need from a Taurus III parent, whom they may see as flaky and unreliable.

As co-workers or business partners, Aries III's and Taurus III's have little in common. Stronger playing together than working together, as a team they lack professional seriousness and commitment to financial and organizational values. Still, they can work well as part of a group developing new concepts and ideas, particularly in design, fashion, advertising or other areas relating to the taste and interest of the general public.

ADVICE: Hear the other party out. Take things a bit more seriously. Find a solid basis for your activities. Commit more deeply if you can.

THE CUSP OF ENERGY

A Profound Education

This relationship specializes in the learning and teaching of deep lessons: both personalities make wonderful friends and advisors to each other. Aries III's tend to ground and direct energetic Taurus-Gemini, and to confront them with the needlessness of their fears, worries and obsessions; they also know how to tickle Taurus-Gemini funny bones, making them laugh not only at human foibles in general but at themselves, which helps them to lose their anxiety. In return, Taurus-Gemini often fascinate Aries III's, and inspire them to new creative heights. It is only fair to say, however, that Taurus-Gemini usually take more than they give in this combination.

Although the relationship is particularly good at analyzing deep emotions, it may not be so effective in their day-to-day expression. This combination may not be ideal for love or marriage, then, since passions can fly as electrically here as in a summer thunderstorm. An Aries III-Taurus-Gemini love affair will be unforgettable for both partners, usually not for its longevity or depth, however, but for its quick appearance and vanishing.

Patient and understanding, Aries III's can make excellent parents for Taurus-Gemini. The Aries III children of a Taurus-Gemini are less lucky: they will not appreciate their parent's obsessive worrying and intrusiveness. As siblings these two can exhaust other family members, who will look on amazed at their high-energy antics and their endless streams of thought and speech.

Scintillating, exciting, inspiring: the Aries III-Taurus-Gemini relationship can be all these things, but it isn't practical. Business ventures and social projects start off like a house on fire, with the best intentions and full of confidence, only to fizzle or just plain collapse. Chances are, however, that this duo may not even notice—most likely they've already moved on to the next project.

Grounding Influence

Although Aries is a fire sign and Gemini air, this relationship has a grounding effect on both personalities, showing the influence of the earth element. Martian (Aries) and mercurial (Gemini) energies also coalesce around this duo's projects, and around the technical problems they're so skilled in solving; in fact they can accomplish a lot together, for their relationship can make them stay still long enough to focus. They should know, however, that the relationship's grounding influence will take time to be felt, and to help them learn and grow.

Aries III's in friendships with Gemini I's are usually quite understanding of their partners' need for constant change and will not try to confine them. And the absolute principles that Aries III's tend to believe in will stimulate the curiosity of Gemini's, who, however, may toss ironic or sarcastic barbs in the ensuing debates that can wound or annoy their Aries III partner. As lovers and mates, these two will initially have quite an exciting time, but the tempo will slow as they get to know each other. Gemini I's may also have difficulty remaining faithful to Aries III's, who are likely to show little sympathy for Gemini I gallivanting. Eventually, though, the relationship will settle down into something quite stable. Parent-child interactions may be less grounded than marriages: Aries III parents are likely to inhibit the Gemini I need for freedom, while Gemini I parents who don't really understand the lofty Aries III ideals and code of honor may become distant, cynical or tyrannical.

As partners in work projects, particularly of a conceptual nature, these two can communicate with lightning speed. Together they have an excellent feeling for the tastes of clients and the strategies of business adversaries. Gemini I attack melds well with Aries III defense, so that this duo can make a formidable commercial team.

ADVICE: Develop organizational strengths. Learn from each other. Without getting into conflict, deepen emotional bonds. Understand and accept.

Seductive Charms

This is a relationship of magnetic attraction and seductive charm, with each partner highly vulnerable to the other's sex appeal. But although physical attraction is a given here, emotional involvement is more of a struggle, since both of these partners try to keep their feelings under control, and to appear cool and composed. Even so, the relationship often brings them to depths of involvement that neither of them may have reached before. If so, they may find it difficult or impossible to detach.

Friendships between these two are often marred by mutual misunderstandings, which may lead to estrangements. Aries III's may find the highly personal language of Gemini II's hard to fathom. The fun-loving sides of both these partners will generally guarantee them a good time together at parties and other social events, but the Gemini II need to ventilate thoughts, often in a critical, biting or sarcastic way, may discomfit Aries III's, who like people to be quiet if they don't have something positive to say. This can put considerable strain on marital or family relationships. Nor will Aries III personal ideals be respected by Gemini II's, who will target the quality of inconsistency and unreality in their partner's beliefs with unmerciful accuracy.

Aries III's can make excellent role models and parents for young Gemini II's, who will look up to them and trust them. Gemini II parents, however, are prone to pry into Aries III children's lives and to worry about their unrealistic attitudes, which can only make them rebellious. Aries III–Gemini II siblings are likely to form strong bonds, but they will often challenge and combat each other both when young and in adult life, particularly in arguments over who performs mutual familial responsibilities.

Rolling Back Frontiers

This relationship can easily focus on the natural world—on exploring, for example, or preserving the environment. The combination can be excellent for a friendship or marriage based on challenge, travel, investigation and in general probing spatial and temporal limits, at home or abroad. Moreover, no matter where these two might roam, their relationship will make them feel physically and mentally comfortable, relaxed and natural.

In Gemini III's, Aries III's will meet their match in the areas of adventure, trailblazing and the tendency to spend hours in activities like wandering, climbing, swimming or flying. Gemini III's are usually unable to stick to one partner for long without looking around for new interests and horizons; but both these extremely independent personalities enjoy having a partner who is just as free, so that they can avoid the guilt, worry or concern they might feel with someone more dependent. These two may not plumb any great emotional depths together that would give them a history of sharing feelings, private struggles and personal problems to fall back on in times of stress or trouble. They would probably do well, then, to keep things light, avoiding quarrels or heavy confrontations.

Aries III–Gemini III siblings, particularly of the opposite sex, may make fine travel companions. This can also be an excellent parent-child relationship; irrespective of which of the two is the adult, the child will be guaranteed a varied palette of activities and interests, and his or her need for challenge will be understood. The mutual stimulation that is a trademark of this relationship can also manifest itself at work, where an Aries III and a Gemini III can comfortably share tasks as co-workers, or can head up an innovative and dynamic business together.

Too Sweet?

This relationship can hold a seductive kind of charm for its participants while at the same time making them recklessly rebellious against its claiming and cloying attitudes. Its seductive power, in fact, can prove to be too much of a good thing.

Aries III's may begin with very protective feelings toward Gemini-Cancers, and once their sympathy is aroused, it is only a small step for them to fall head over heels in love. Seductive to the extreme, Gemini-Cancers may be unconsciously leading Aries III's on without realizing it. Actually, though, the Gemini-Cancer is more likely to become devoted than the Aries III, who may become uncomfortable with the extent of Gemini-Cancer feeling, and if so might feel forced to rebel. Otherwise, however, as a love affair this relationship can work out well.

Should marriage loom, on the other hand, Gemini-Cancers are much too private as people to be happy with the kind of entourage with which Aries III's surround themselves, especially at home. Territorial conflicts may also arise, since both of these two, and particularly Gemini-Cancers, must be able to call their home their own. If the marriage is to have a chance, both of them will have to learn to share, adjust and accommodate.

Within families, Gemini-Cancers may be able to give Aries III's the emotional understanding they need, but are unlikely to receive it in return. Whether as parents or siblings, Aries III's are likely to be overprotective and to stifle Gemini-Cancer development. Friendships between these two are likely to have a positive effect on Gemini-Cancers, bringing them more into touch with the social world around them. Aries III's too will benefit, getting a sympathetic shoulder to cry or lean on. As co-workers, these partners will distrust the charm of their relationship with each other, and one or both of them is likely to upset the apple cart.

ADVICE: Agree on domestic matters. Cut down the traffic, but don't isolate yourself. Develop responsibility and trust.

Fill 'Er Up

This relationship may revolve around energy, whether the issue is deciding what the best use and application of its energies might be, or figuring out what its energy requirements are and how are they being met. This will involve quite a bit of discussion and verbal exchange, which will themselves use a fair amount of energy. It is important for these two to verbalize their needs and to learn to focus—they can have plenty of fuel available to them but be ignorant of when and how to fill up the tank.

Aries III's often have energy to give, but don't understand Cancer I's well enough to know how to deliver it. And while they are unceasingly devoted, and always ready to help both humanity in general and individuals in particular, the deep, hard-to-satisfy needs of Cancer I's may still prove too much for them to handle. This is one reason why this relationship requires extraordinary and unceasing energy. Even an experienced, vital Aries III may be frustrated in trying to satisfy a Cancer I lover, friend or spouse. Cancer I's, on the other hand, will always understand Aries III needs, but usually lack the energy to keep up with them, let alone satisfy them.

Still, this duo can prove an excellent team in business. Cancer I's have a good feeling for money, and can often be wise investors; they will also be good at occupying home base and keep things functioning there while Aries III's are forging ahead elsewhere, lining up new accounts and clients, or selling a product. Initiative and the power to go for it are usually much higher in Aries III's, who may from time to time have to give Cancer I's a gentle push to get them moving. Unfortunately, unless Cancer I's are self-motivated in a given task or activity, they usually have difficulty achieving and sustaining forward momentum in this relationship.

ADVICE: Work on being happy. Sometimes you don't know how lucky you are. Balance your energies. Learn to give and take. Be more understanding.

Independent—or Subordinate?

These very different personalities are diametric opposites in most of their respective psychologies—Aries III's oriented outward, toward the world, Cancer II's inward—yet both are very independent. The crucial issue in this relationship is whether they exercise their desire to be free or subordinate their individuality to being together. A Cancer II, for example, may join an Aries III partner in a drive toward success, or may decide that his or her own emotional life and inner development are more important priorities. In love and marriage, furthermore, Cancer II's are unlikely to allow Aries III's entrance to their private and often strange fantasy life. There are questions as to how deep or personal this relationship can become, then, from the outset. If these two do choose to be together, however, the synergy of their relationship may forge a bond that will surmount their individual differences.

Should these two marry they can achieve an uncommon unity of interest, with the Cancer II concentrating on the domestic and nurturing activities, the Aries III battling the world. Their differences can even complement and help each other, as Cancer II's put active Aries III's more in touch with their emotional center and Aries III's expose Cancer II's to social issues. Both parties are usually understanding enough of their mate to prevent themselves from precipitating arguments or reacting to differences in outlook with irritation or anger.

The Aries III need to communicate is likely to be frustrated when this relationship manifests in business, at work and in friendships, since Cancer II's find it difficult to share with a partner. They are often also too tied up with their own concerns to provide for all of the needs of an Aries III child. Aries III's, however, can prove remarkably understanding parents for Cancer II's, as long as they don't try to impose their ideas on them too heavily. From childhood through adolescence, Cancer II–Aries III siblings are likely to share a private world, concerned with collecting, fantasy or decorating their shared space.

ADVICE: Without giving up your individuality, learn to share. Emphasize the qualities you have in common. Join in everyday tasks. Make up your mind about priorities.

Fighting for Freedom

The primary theme of this combination is the fight for personal freedom. The relationship will often involve power struggles, then, and is unlikely to be stable, especially since these two have trouble sticking to anything. There is a built-in desire here to be free of everything the relationship creates, whether it be a commitment or other structure, or simply a joint interest.

Aries III's and Cancer III's who become romantically involved will have an interesting, varied and intense relationship. Cancer III's usually have to have things their way, but their power to persuade and manipulate will be sorely tested by the resistance and willfulness of their Aries III partners in love and marriage. These two are better suited to each other as lovers than as spouses, since the combination's conflicts, tensions and searing passions go better with excitement, often sexual, than with stability and security. The Cancer III predilection to excess can be triggered if they find themselves playing second fiddle to more worldly Aries III's.

At work, Aries III's want only to be successful (though this is vital to them), while Cancer III's are driven to reach the top. For a Cancer III, a fight for personal freedom against the influence of a less ambitious partner is likely to be a theme of this matchup.

Friendships between these two are probably unusual, since career, social or economic competition is likely to take precedence over trust, sharing and just plain fun. Likewise, Aries III–Cancer III siblings are likely to engage in unproductive struggles that may disrupt family life. As parents these two are likely to be adversely influenced by each other to the point where they will engage in power struggles over children, particularly should the relationship break up. Cancer III parents will be frustrated by their inability to control or protect their independent Aries III child, who may see their influence as oppressive or smothering; Aries III parents are also likely to be challenged by a Cancer III child, particularly one of the same sex, and battles for supremacy within the family group may result, particularly if the other parent is the mutually desired object of their struggle.

ADVICE: Struggle can make you strong, but also, alas, insensitive. Avoid unnecessary conflict. Respect the values of others. Seek stability.

A Peak Experience

Dominated by the fiery aspects of both its partners, this relationship is striking for its intensity of feeling, sexuality or simply energy. Love between these two can be ardent and romantic, featuring trips to unusual places, physically challenging and dangerous endeavors, sexual or druglike highs and revelations abounding. Should such peak experiences or epiphanies materialize on just a few occasions, they may be enough to ensure the relationship's continuance. Should they be constantly sought for, however, they can grow addictive, the pure love once felt becoming muddled and dangerously unrealistic. A potentially painful and destructive separation may be necessary. To avoid this, Aries III's need to keep their self-sacrificial streak from getting out of control, and Cancer-Leos to beware of getting lost in possessiveness or overly needy demands.

Both Aries III's and Cancer-Leos are dauntless and courageous, making them good companions in challenging adventures and also protective parents and friends. Aries III's, however, generally have a high energy level, particularly when engaged in a project, while Cancer-Leos are prone to great fluctuations of energy and mood. If a Cancer-Leo goes into a depressive phase, this can create conflicts with an Aries III, who won't like hearing complaints and is likely to be worn down by excessive negativity. Should a Cancer-Leo fall into a downward spiral in the middle of a joint endeavor, an Aries III will likely grow impatient and frustrated, and may want to discontinue this working relationship. Aries III's who are married to Cancer-Leos tend to be more understanding of their moods, but even a deep love can be eroded away over time.

Cancer-Leo children are apt to find Aries III parents less than sympathetic to their emotional state. The Aries III will listen to, think about and discuss their problems, but may never really empathize. As a result, Cancer-Leo offspring often feel misunderstood by what they perceive as a godlike Aries III parent.

ADVICE: Go with the flow. Life has its ups and downs. Cultivate patience and understanding. Strive for empathy. Put matters of the heart first.

Bridging the Gap

This relationship has to find translation tools to bridge the gap between different modes of thought and communication. Misunderstanding is common here, since both partners consider themselves authorities on many subjects, and have their own, highly individual terminology. Nor is either likely to compromise in order to move toward understanding. Ideally, this relationship will evolve its own original language in which the duo can share their often contrasting ideas.

Aries III's have something to teach Leo I's about being more accepting of people, particularly those they disagree with. Leo I's, on the other hand, can help Aries III's learn how to direct their energies so as to strive for inward goals first before moving outward toward the world. Friendships in this combination, particularly when the partners are of the same sex, can be very close relationships featuring learning and sharing at a deep level.

In love, Aries III's and Leo I's tend to favor sexuality over sensuality. They are more likely to express warmth and affection in their friendships than in their love affairs. Leo I's demand variety and change in their sexual relationships, and hate being tied down to predictable patterns, and in this respect they will test Aries III's to the limit. But Leo I's also want a cheerful lover with whom they can have fun, and who will give them respite from their all-consuming work, and Aries III may fit both of these requirements well.

Family life of some sort is a must for Aries III's, whereas Leo I's can capably function alone, and have no crying need for an audience or a constituency. In marriages between these two, Aries III's must be prepared to shoulder the brunt of the responsibilities, since Leo I's are likely to be away a lot. The relationship has a great deal to teach its offspring, who, however, may not always be that eager to learn, and may come to see their parents' didactic attitudes as repressive of their own individual language.

ADVICE: Friendship and love need not be mutually exclusive. Beware of all-knowing attitudes. Be ready to listen and to learn. Play together.

A Titanic Battle

This relationship is often intensely confrontational, and its struggles can assume gigantic proportions. Neither party will show much willingness to back down. Marriages are not particularly recommended here, then, but may sometimes work out if a cease-fire and a suitable division of labor can be agreed upon, or if the partners unite together in a cause, or in a fight for something outside the relationship.

The central issue in this couple's love affairs will usually be love versus power. The level of the relationship's combativeness will often be directly related to its level of passion. Peace can come if both partners are willing to give up their struggles and commit themselves to unconditional love, but this often won't be possible, and the affair may bring great pain before it inevitably ends. Both of these partners are very physical types, so that bodily threat, which in more extreme cases may even be fulfilled, cannot be ruled out. These two are also capable of a great deal of emotional detachment, and neither should expect a great deal of sympathy from the other.

Because they are so evenly matched in their will to win, Aries III's and Leo II's make excellent opponents for each other in sport, business, love and other areas, including family, where they can exercise their competitive instincts in socially accepted ways. Outright enmity between them, though possible, is unlikely except in extreme cases, because of their mutual respect for each other's power and capabilities. Friendship often arise between Aries III's and Leo II's who were once opponents, then acquaintances, then companions, and finally friends, a process that allows a gradual but firm creation of bonds of trust. Forged in the crucible of experience, such relationships are likely to be able to withstand great stresses over the years, and these partners have the capacity to be extremely faithful to one another.

A Search for Common Goals

Aries III and Leo III occupy a position trine to each other (120° apart in the zodiac), so conventional astrology predicts an easy relationship between them. But this is rarely the case. These two strong individuals both want to involve themselves in the world, and the main theme of their relationship will always be the search to identify and achieve objectives. The search, moreover, will always be as important as the achievement, if not more so. The consequence is that these two arouse each other's competitive instincts like few other matchups in the year. Bringing out the worst in each other (as well as the best), they find it extremely hard to achieve a true sense of unity. Both are born leaders, and should they be able to function together in an executive capacity, they are capable of leading any group, company, social or sports endeavor to new heights, and of inspiring commitment and drive in those who work for them. It is equally possible, however, that their power struggles will tear their projects apart, and that their ego struggles will prevent them from focusing on the common good.

Leo III's are extremely difficult to get close to emotionally. In love and marriage they require extremely understanding partners and mates, and Aries III's don't always have the time or inclination (but often do have the psychological talent) to unravel the mysteries of their darker side. Still, in times of need and trouble, Aries III's may be among the few people Leo III's can turn to in order to relieve their pain and torment.

Children of this pair may not find either parent very empathic, but generally speaking, Aries III's make the more sympathetic parent of these two; Leo III's are prone to spoiling their favorite child, and can thus arouse antagonistic jealousy not only in their other children but in their mate as well. Family confrontations between Leo III's and Aries III's may be real knock-down, drag-out affairs that leave other relatives out of breath or exhausted. Such battles arise often, particularly over issues of power, with Aries III's proceeding more out of ideological motives and Leo III's more out of personal ones.

ADVICE: Leaders should never forget their constituency. Listen to what others say about you. Don't be afraid to admit errors. Stay unified.

A One-Way Street

This relationship is often a one-way street pointed in the direction of the Leo-Virgo, and mostly devoted to exposing their secret, hidden side. Moreover, this fact is usually itself only tacitly acknowledged, remaining an unspoken aspect of the combination—one that requires a strong basis in trust.

In love, marital and family relationships, Leo-Virgos demand to be understood by their partners. Aries III's who are expected to show this understanding may be capable of but not always interested in doing so. On the other hand, if their self-sacrificing side comes out, they just may roll up their sleeves and take on the task of unraveling a Leo-Virgo partner. Their success will not be guaranteed: Leo-Virgos usually have a few tricks up their sleeve, and at the very moment when Aries III's feel they are getting somewhere, Leo-Virgos are likely to take the wind out of their sails by revealing themselves in a thoroughly exhibitionistic display.

This may not be a passionate combination, and love affairs are probably best put aside in favor of acquaintanceships or easygoing friendships. Love is blind, however, and Leo-Virgos can develop secret passions for Aries III's. Whether or not they return this passion, Aries III's will be capable of discretion and deserving of trust, rarely revealing Leo-Virgo secrets at a later date.

Leo-Virgos and Aries III's can form firm friendships around a particular activity, usually one of a practical nature. They work well together, and are likely to combine a friendship with a shared career project; if so, this endeavor can often be successful and somewhat lucrative. Leo-Virgos can learn to express their ambition from Aries III role models, who are not at all shy about putting their best foot forward and forcing others to recognize their abilities. Mutual trust and admiration distinguish both working relationships and friendships between these two.

Mysterious Mix

This relationship produces a powerful effect in one area in particular: career. The main point of departure between these two—Virgo I rationality in thought and planning versus Aries III intuition and spontaneity—may cause occasional flare-ups, but for the most part their respective strengths mysteriously complement each other when they work together. These service-oriented individuals can also bring out the more responsible side in each other, so that if their relationship focuses on the welfare of others, it can have a devotional streak. In those cases the combination can be of great benefit to humanity.

Virgo I's get nervous and stressed unless they keep their home and career lives separate. Aries III's find this kind of separation impossible, for they don't feel that their work in the world stops when they get home. This can put Virgo I–Aries III marriages under a lot of strain, particularly when the Aries III decides to invite over a bunch of friends, co-workers or disciples just when the Virgo I is snuggling into a warm, quiet domestic evening. It may be only a matter of time before the Aries III begins to look around for an escape. This too will make the Virgo I nervous, forcing him or her to hold on even tighter. Still, things can go well between these two, especially if the structure they set up in their living situation relieves Aries III's of responsibilities they would rather leave to a more orderly person anyway.

In the long run, Virgo I's may have a salutary, even magical effect on the energies of their Aries III children, who may not appreciate their parents at the time but will undoubtedly manifest more orderly personal habits and working methods later in life.

ADVICE: Respect privacy. Try not bring your work home. Structure your living situation thoughtfully. Think of the greater good.

Private Worlds

This relationship likes to investigate, unlock and gain mastery over more private and at times mysterious areas of experience. The matchup is interesting, since its theme of mastery manifests in two very separate, very different worlds: Virgo II's are taken up with very personal endeavors, Aries III's with very worldly ones. Though these two share a similar kind of drive, the spheres of influence in which they choose to express it are so wholly unrelated to each other that it would be hard for anyone to imagine a true union between them.

Virgo II's are seldom easily approached or understood, but they don't mind someone coming on to them forcefully (as Aries III's may), since they are confident of their ability to repulse attack. Often, in fact, they will secretly admire Aries III forcefulness and drive. As spouses they will appreciate the protectiveness of Aries III's, as lovers their ardent and dynamic nature. Virgo II's can live alone very well, so they may not jump at the opportunity to live with an Aries III, preferring their own space. And if they do decide to marry or live with an Aries III, the latter will have to adjust to their lifestyle, which demands privacy. If friction is to be avoided, Aries III's will have to give up some of their social life. But Virgo II's will go a long way to reach agreement in these matters if they are deeply enough in love.

Whether in marriage, love or family, the relationship does not favor deep emotion. Virgo II critical attitudes and Aries III drive and ideological preoccupations usually shift the spotlight away from the world of feelings, and the relationship can be rather cool and detached. This does not make for the most empathic parent-child or sibling relationship, but at least the partners will usually know where they stand with each other.

The caution and critical nature of Virgo II's can make it hard for more exuberant and positive Aries III's to work with them. Yet what Aries III's want and what they need are often quite different, and Virgo II's may actually ground and support their more dynamic and fanciful Aries III co-workers in a very positive way.

ADVICE: Be ready to compromise. Find a balance between public and private. Emphasize trust and sharing. Distinguish between wants and needs.

Strict Requirements

Responsibility is usually the keynote of this relationship; each partner will live up to every requirement to be there for the other in a time of need or crisis. Although ordinarily the relationship often has its best chance in areas where dependability is more important than affection or sympathy, its staunchness may also create an unusual type of empathy.

A matchup between two such strong-willed individuals as these will certainly have its ups and downs. Virgo III's are extremely discriminating and selective in their choices; having passed rigorous tests, an Aries III will feel privileged to be the lover of a Virgo III. This couple's affairs can be intense, with Virgo III's tending to have the upper hand, since they usually know better than Aries III's do exactly what they want and don't want. Unless the relationship involves a strong bond of mutual respect, harmonious living or working situations may be impossible. If Aries III's find Virgo III's selfish, or Virgo III's see Aries III's as unrealistic or self-deceiving, the pairing may quickly become unstable or even confrontational. Aries III–Virgo III friendships can be extremely strong; the lack of romantic involvement will forestall many of the relationship's emotional problems, aiding its stability.

In marriage, the partners' strict demands and requirements for their living situation will not meld well. But once the devotion to duty inherent in this combination becomes apparent and living arrangements are worked out, this can prove a long-lasting, faithful union. Children of this pair will have to be tough if they are not to be dominated by their parents, both of whom can be devoted and understanding but also overbearing.

Possibilities for Personal Growth

This relationship may serve to open up both philosophical, social or aesthetic understanding and other, more worldly matters to its partners, who will use this understanding, however, more to advance their ambitions as a couple than as a spiritual resource. These two are generally pragmatic; unless they are strongly attracted to each other physically, which is unlikely, a passionate love affair is usually ruled out between them. Their rather unromantic striving for aesthetic or philosophic excellence may prove more important and gratifying to them if they are friends or spouses.

The relationship may require one of the partners to assume a parental or even paternal role, and that partner is likely to be the Aries III. Virgo-Libras need a strong and responsible mate or friend to support them, and Aries III's can play that part well. The heroic nature of the Aries III personality can also serve as the hook for a Virgo-Libra's psychological projections: having idolized or depended on a friend or family member when young, Virgo-Libras may unconsciously seek that person's qualities later in life, and may think they have found them in an Aries III. Seeing this happening, Aries III's may feel a certain resentment at being cast in this parental role; they will want to be loved and appreciated for who they are, not as a projection of someone else.

Even so, a marriage between these two can succeed. Aries III's are capable of a deep understanding of people, and will be able to see beyond the glitzy appearances with which Virgo-Libras often surround themselves, and to alert them to deeper possibilities for personal growth. There may be other difficulties, however, the most prominent of these being the fact that matters of taste and aesthetics are not of great interest to most Aries III's but are of utmost importance to Virgo-Libras. This couple may quarrel, then, over the importance of dress, furnishings, architectural design and decoration. But Aries III's can learn a great deal from Virgo-Libras about how to appreciate aesthetic beauty, and about its value and use in the world.

ADVICE: Learn through mutual appreciation. Explore spiritual and aesthetic areas. Beware of running old scripts. See people for who they are.

Unusual Glue

This relationship is an unusual, even rare pairing, and knows it. As such it may strive to be more conventional, or even just to be understood—generally to no avail. These two are very different, and the way their energies meld is hard to define. Nothing about the pairing or its behavior is typical.

Often completely unconscious of the subtleties of love and emotion, Aries III's may at first view a relationship with Libra I as the most perfect of all loves. Blinded by Libra I attractiveness, they may be totally unaware of how things really stand, and can find themselves chewed up and spat out without even realizing what's happening. In fact they may never find out how the Libra I really feels about them emotionally.

Libra I's for their part are rarely satisfied with themselves, let alone with anyone else. In the most meticulous way, they may succeed in destroying an Aries III's pride in winning them, thus depriving him or her of much-needed ego satisfaction. Their balloons popped, Aries III mates and lovers may have little choice but either to surrender utterly to the Libra I or simply to slink off and lick their wounds. Aries III's, however, have an iconoclastic streak, and may ultimately be pushed to tear apart a Libra I's perfectionistic and difficult facade. In the end, relieved to be understood, this may win the Libra I over. Each partner's shredding of the other will become the unconventional glue that binds them together.

It is probably better, however, if relationships between these two, particularly friendships and family and working pairings, are kept on the less personal, more unemotional side. A friendship between these two can work out well, with Libra I's earning kudos from Aries III's for their technical expertise and efficiency, and Aries III's being praised by Libra I's for their energy and drive. As co-workers, this team has a lot to offer a company or business, and in family situations both Libra I's and Aries III's will lend both dash and zest to the most boring gatherings.

Knowing Thyself

More than most, this relationship will concern itself with the objective world and with ambition. If the pairing is to last, however, the key focus should be on understanding the subjective world of this couple's own relationship, and of their own and each other's inner lives. As a team, ironically, this duo may have a good understanding of the psychology of other human beings, and of society in general, but within the relationship, unreality is likely to be a big problem. Both Aries III's and Libra II's are prone to problematical love affairs, since both of them usually lack a clear idea of either themselves or their partner; in their relationship with each other, this trait is magnified.

Although unstable and rocky, Aries III–Libra II love affairs and marriages can nevertheless endure for long periods as the parties focus on their worldly goals. The relationship may unfortunately swallow up its partners' individuality, making separations and breakups extremely difficult and painful. On the plus side, Libra II's are fun to be with and can help take the minds of Aries III's off more serious matters; Aries III's can provide the security and confidence that Libra II's desire. Parent-child matchups in this combination, and in either possible version, can work out well, with mutual respect and love, as long as they are not dominated by competition and jealousy involving the other parent or another child. Libra II–Aries III sibling pairs have a great deal to offer, both to each other and to family life, particularly in the social sphere.

Aries III–Libra II friendships probably work best if they are career based. At work, business partnerships in this combination can be extremely persuasive and successful. An understanding of the collective makes success likely in fields such as advertising, public relations, health care, the arts, sales or marketing. Particularly telling is an awareness of what people need and want, so that dreaming up a product or service and getting it on the rails is a specialty here.

ADVICE: Be there through good times and bad. Apply your insights to yourself. Clear away the haze. Have fun, but confront more serious matters too.

LIBRA III

Out Front

Prominent here are likely to be honesty and openness, but not necessarily closeness, since these two personalities are often competitive and even combative. (Aries III and Libra III are opposites, 180° apart in the zodiac.) Any covert or illicit activity will create problems, since both parties like to be up front about what they do. Concealment, and the fear, guilt and shame that for these two accompany hiding anything, do not suit the relationship. Since both parties are very sexual, and quite openly so, physical enjoyment will figure prominently in this pairing.

Both these parties are dominant and need to occupy center stage, but marriages between them can be quite successful. Although Libra III's can't stand other people to be emotionally dependent on them, they themselves occasionally need a strong figure to lean on, who can well be an Aries III. The relationship may require compromise, however, in the area of children: Aries III's love children and family in general, and Libra III's do not. Perhaps the number of children can be limited, or their care can be handled primarily by the Aries III, leaving the Libra III free to pursue a career.

Since both of these personalities need a lot of autonomy at work, they are an unlikely business team. Should each head up their own service, business or company division, they may form a relationship as equal allies, but are just as likely to battle it out as fierce competitors. Aries III's and Libra III's are dynamic, knowledgeable, ambitious and hard-driving individuals who will be more than a match for each other.

Two siblings of this combination are likely to be competitive and argumentative. Friendships will have the same qualities, and may be short-lived; tremendous conflicts can similarly arise in Aries III–Libra III parent-child relationships, threatening the family's very fabric. Curiously, both parent-child and sibling combinations may be more viable later in life, proving particularly capable and interested in dealing with financial and other practical problems.

ADVICE: Compromise is often necessary. Work to get closer. Develop true sharing and acceptance. Tone down dominant tendencies.

Persuasive Ideas

Ideas or ideologies will be the central focus of this relationship, which will be strongly concerned with persuading other people, or selling to them. In some cases, if the pair are united in a common outlook, the relationship can prove extremely charismatic and convincing in itself.

Both Aries III's and Libra-Scorpios are fascinated by ideas, but their approaches in this area are extremely different. Aries III's will enthusiastically support concepts that they believe provide a basis for their own actions; Libra-Scorpios are more intellectual and objective, rarely letting ideas control their lives. A certain level of conflict will ensue as these two try to balance their opposing views, and this may preclude a long-term love affair. A short, passionate involvement, however, especially a predominantly sexual one, may be possible.

Libra-Scorpios have intense and complex feelings, and Aries III straightforwardness may not be the most calming or effective way to approach them, particularly in an intimate relationship such as marriage. Aries III's are generally much too busy getting the job done to stop to argue with Libra-Scorpios, and are likely to consider what they see as negativity, or destructive criticism, from such a partner an annoyance or hindrance. Not being taken seriously is unbearable to Libra-Scorpios, and if this reaction becomes a pattern, it may end the relationship.

Friendships are often a better bet here, since they tend to be easier and lighter, and to favor the sharing of a variety of activities. Both Aries III's and Libra-Scorpios have a concern for their fellow human beings, and are drawn to group efforts; they may work well together in a social or service setting where the welfare of others is the primary concern. As a partnership, these two can be a powerful force for community good. The relationship will be less effective in family situations, where a host of personal irritations and emotional conflicts will cause unsettling oscillations of mood.

New Levels of Excitement

This relationship is likely to be vibrant and imaginative, though punctuated by occasional blowups. Its alchemy can be simultaneously mysterious and passionate. Both parties are often extremely sexual, and their love affairs with each other, often carried on in secret, can reach high peaks of desire and consummation. This comes, however, with no small level of emotional turmoil.

In love and marriage, Aries III's are likely to find themselves dominated by Scorpio I's. This relationship can stir up their deepest emotional layers, making it hard for them to work, and creating trouble in other areas of their lives—completely throwing them off balance. Scorpio I's are much more comfortable with this relationship's firestorms. They are no strangers to emotional turmoil, which is often a constant background for them in their creative or professional work. Controlling their own feelings while calling the shots in the powerful emotional world they share with another is a specialty of Scorpio I's, who will tend to control the inner workings of this relationship and many others as well.

Scorpio I's will tend to keep their Aries III spouses on a tight rein. They won't usually approve of Aries III largesse, or of the Aries III tendency to bring home the latest interesting person they have met. Good at making a little money go a long way, Scorpio I's will probably see Aries III spending as wasteful and counterproductive; where Aries III's see the big picture, Scorpio I's home in on the details. Although some of their attempts to make Aries III's more attentive and realistic will be helpful, they should be careful: too much blaming and criticism will have a negative effect. Despite their power as the spouse or mate of an Aries III, Scorpio I parents will have difficulty controlling their Aries III children, who must be free to do things their own way. Same-sex Aries III–Scorpio I siblings will usually compete with each other, their shared martian orientation (Mars rules Aries and co-rules Scorpio) leading to outbursts of anger and even perhaps violence. As friends, Aries III's and Scorpio I's can form a close bond, sharing exciting, challenging and somewhat dangerous experiences.

ADVICE: Self-control can be liberating. Feelings don't have to be upsetting. Refine and broaden your emotional palette. Keep calm.

Differences in Tempo

This relationship will have to deal with uncertainty and instability, particularly in working situations. Since Scorpio II's are patient, long-suffering and watchful whereas Aries III's are generally impatient and in a hurry to move on to something new, differences in tempo, style and feeling will cause problems here. Furthermore, Scorpio II's can resent the leadership qualities of Aries III's, whom they may see as inflexible and dictatorial. A struggle may emerge over where the authority in the relationship lies.

Love between these two generally features storm and struggle. Because Scorpio II's tend to repress their emotions, they may work to make an Aries III partner manifest the repressed feelings of jealousy, anger or rage that they themselves have hammered down deep inside. Aries III's for their part may be taken aback by the emotionality they expose in this relationship, since they try to project a cool image, and avoid messy scenes.

On the positive side, pioneering Aries III's may learn from Scorpio II's that the greatest challenges they face may be internal, and that exploring their own selves may be the most daunting yet rewarding venture they could devise. In return, they can often waken Scorpio II's from their lethargy and inspire them to take part in the world around them. As friends or mates, then, Aries III's and Scorpio II's have much to teach each other.

In the family, serious struggles over authority may occur between these two, particularly when they are siblings of the same sex. Persisting into adult life, such encounters may involve finances, inheritances and dominance in the family group. In parent-child relationships, and particularly if the Scorpio II is the parent, the key to avoiding strife is the parent's ability to leave the child alone as much as possible.

ADVICE: Learn when to care and when to back off. Avoid power struggles. Work on understanding. Accept common authority. Stay inspirational.

SCORPIO III

Wowie Zowie

Varied and exciting, this relationship may pursue many different areas of interest. It likes to be exposed to the unexpected, which can open up whole new worlds of expression. New and unusual ideologies may also open up new spiritual horizons.

Scorpio III's who are swept off their feet by Aries III's may have to give up their controlling attitudes. This can be good, since by keeping everything under control, Scorpio III's often miss out on some of life's most enjoyable and interesting experiences. In a relationship with an Aries III, a Scorpio III can enter a whole new world in which his or her deep emotional side can find full expression. And what do Aries III's get from Scorpio III's? A world of rich feelings that they may never have imagined. To gain a Scorpio III's love, of course, they'll have to give up something too, namely some of their focus on work or career: this relationship will demand a lot of attention. But if the result is that they take more care of their own emotional life, which they may have neglected for years, the relationship will have done them good.

Aries III-Scorpio III spouses may find that once their initial passions have cooled, an objectivity may arrive in which their attitudes to each other become more critical and unforgiving. Disagreement over domestic and financial management, child-rearing, vacations and a host of other subjects are likely, and can destabilize what once seemed an almost ideal matchup. On the upside, these two have a freshness of ideas that allows for a lot creative problem-solving.

Friendships and family relationships may be satisfactory but uninspiring. Attitudes about how friends or family members should act toward each other can be unyielding and sometimes morally overbearing. These two will have to try not to let their ideas on subjects ranging from group activities to social attitudes get rigid or dogmatic.

ADVICE: Keep the relationship young. Don't get bogged down in disagreement. Fight overly dogmatic tendencies. Stay forgiving and flexible.

On the Mountain Top

This relationship will provide the ground for the deep social consciousness and ideological side that many Scorpio-Sagittarians and Aries III's have in common. Blooming in their relationship, this concern can prove deeply satisfying to both partners. Furthermore, the combination can create well-balanced marriages and friendships through the partners' shared ideas and feelings about the structure of society. It is not unusual for this duo to enjoy exploring new fields of thought together, perhaps even involving themselves in or leading a group dedicated to promoting social reforms or establishing new institutions. The partners themselves, family members or a group of friends or co-workers may serve as guinea pigs for such work.

Aries III's usually need to help those around them, but Scorpio-Sagittarians are stubbornly independent and cannot accept the kind of protection and aid that Aries III's have to offer. In some personal relationships, Scorpio-Sagittarians and Aries III's will reach a compromise in which Aries III's are free to inflict their help on one and all—except their Scorpio-Sagittarian partners.

In matters of love, Aries III's will have difficulty expressing their deeper feelings to Scorpio-Sagittarians. They in turn will find the complex inner world of Scorpio-Sagittarians hard to penetrate, assuming they are even interested in doing so. (Aries III friends of Scorpio-Sagittarians will have the same problem.) The relationship's shared ideological interests may be more of a focus than physical matters, so that regular sexual interaction is not usually required as the years go by. Strongly platonic feelings can well emerge over time, so that the relationship will evolve to a high, calm spiritual level, though it began like a house on fire.

Scorpio-Sagittarians will find the impetuosity and boundless energy of Aries III's hard to deal with, and may experience some frustration in trying to get them to sit down and think things out. On the other hand, sibling pairs in this combination are often on the same wavelength, and can appreciate and understand each other even in silence.

ADVICE: Keep your ideas to yourself occasionally. Tend to everyday matters. Don't neglect finances. The body has to be fed too. Share feelings more.

Enthusiasm Enough

A recurring theme in this relationship is an enthusiastic youthfulness that brings great joy and easy interaction. It is characterized by a quick-wittedness and a virtuosic ability to interact—in fact timing is always impeccable in this matchup. The key to the relationship, in whatever area of life it appears, is mutual self-respect. A strong belief in honor and fair play, for example, can form a solid basis for friendship.

Aries III's and Sagittarius I's are likely to become fast friends who will stick by each other through thick and thin. The appearance on the scene of a love object attractive to both of them, however, may spell great difficulties, with passion and ethics vying for ascendancy. Financial or professional competition is likely to pose less of a threat to this friendship than matters of the heart. Probably the most trying situation would be a love triangle in which one of the friends had fallen in love with the established mate or lover of the other.

Unlike Aries III's, Sagittarius I's have little need for company on a daily basis. Perfectly capable of living alone for long periods, they will rarely jump into a marriage, or into a permanent living situation with a lover. This combination is not the most likely one for marriage, then, although its love affairs can be deep, fulfilling and enduring.

As co-workers or business partners, these two can function extremely well, particularly in technical matters. An unrealistic financial outlook, however, may create problems. Enthusiasm there will be, but unless one of the partners (or someone outside the relationship) adopts a hard-headed, pragmatic approach and keeps a sharp eye on costs, these two may find themselves enjoying more fun than success.

Sagittarius I's often bond strongly to one parent, whom they tend to idolize; Aries III's are quite capable of handling the enormous responsibilities of this situation, and can make excellent parents in such a role. Sagittarius I's can also prove highly protective and stimulating parents for Aries III children.

ADVICE: Overenthusiasm can be dangerous. Try to be realistic, and don't wear blinders. Beware of competition in love. Don't neglect money matters.

Effective Leadership

The success of this relationship will usually depend on whether effective leadership and direction can be established within it. Unfortunately, Sagittarius II's have an erratic and idiosyncratic side that will not suit Aries III's in areas that demand a lot of stability, such as marriage and work. There, Aries III's tend to have fixed moral ideas, and Sagittarius II's can find it difficult or impossible to live up to them. Hard-working and single-minded leaders capable of giving direction to any project, Aries III's will not always be understanding when Sagittarius II's decide they have had enough in midstream.

In love relationships between these two, passions will flare, with good and bad results. The partners' common fire energies (both Aries and Sagittarius are fire signs) will feed on each other and at times burn out of control, with Sagittarius II anger likely to run out of hand; Aries III's will tend to remain immovable in the face of such outbursts, refusing to give ground, particularly if their self-interest or the survival of the relationship itself is at stake. Sagittarius II's can be very demanding of their lovers, perhaps asking an Aries III to disassociate him- or herself from existing friends and admirers. If so, the Aries III may come to feel that the affair isn't really worth it. Marriages between these two may not last unless both partners continue to support the primacy of the relationship over their own needs for freedom and self-expression.

Siblings in this combination are likely to experience more than their share of combat and conflict, which is likely to upset the family group. Yet there is also a strange loyalty here, which will unite them against danger and threat. Even so, acquaintanceships and other casual relationships are likely to be the best bets for this pair, who otherwise tend to trigger each other emotionally. Their friendships are likely to be most successful if they don't demand deep feeling or daily interaction and contact.

ADVICE: Take a stand, despite the risk. Don't change direction in midstream. Stay loyal through good times and bad. Beware of emotions running out of control.

The Challenge to Accept

This relationship's success will hinge on whether or not these two can accept each other. Aries III's and Sagittarius III's are trine to each other in the zodiac (120° apart), so they are supposed to have a relaxed, easy time of it together; but although they do understand each other intuitively, and may have solid friendships, they also tend to distrust each other's motives and energies, so that other relationships may have to be built brick by brick. This relationship will surely demand that each party work toward fuller acceptance of each other. In many areas, all-out struggles or confrontations may abound, and since neither of these fiery personalities (both Aries and Sagittarius are fire signs) will normally back down, one or both may get hurt in the process. These hurts are sometimes self-inflicted, since in competition either one of these two may try so hard to overcome the other that they go beyond sensible limits. Again, acceptance is the key if such struggles are to be avoided or at least minimized. Great reformers both, these two will undoubtedly struggle against all that they see as unacceptable in the world.

Aries III's and Sagittarius III's in love must acknowledge and accept absolute mutual equality, since neither of them can tolerate being dominated by the kinds of energies possessed by the other. Attraction, sexual and otherwise, can be strong between these two, and any negative feelings that emerge will be correspondingly deep. If emotional swings are to be avoided, the relationship will have to develop bonds of tenderness and sympathy, and egotism will have to be severely limited. Aries III–Sagittarius III marriages will benefit from the stability of home and family. They can be based on large projects that include children and relatives. When these two are co-workers or business partners, on the other hand, disagreements on the course of action to follow usually create friction. As siblings, particularly of the same sex, these two are a good match for each other. Few understand the Sagittarius III need to be left alone to figure things out as well as an Aries III brother or sister. Aries III parents may be less understanding of their Sagittarius III children and may make the mistake of either pressuring them into acquiescence or trying to work them out of a mood.

ADVICE: Beware of dominance. Establish equality. Strive for unconditional acceptance and love. Agree to bury the hatchet. Work together.

A Beautiful Future

This relationship may revolve around the investigation of future scenarios and possibilities, including those of a more personal nature, with self-assurance and resolve. Keeping an eye to the future, and all types of prediction, will be important in this combination; both parties are interested in looking ahead, perhaps even in leading others there. They need, however, to avoid dreaminess and overoptimism, and to remember to focus on the practicalities of the here and now.

In a marriage or love relationship with a Sagittarius-Capricorn, Aries III's will often see great potential in their partner's more hidden personality, and will seek to draw it out or develop it. Great objectivity and care must be used here, since if Aries III's get carried away by their need to be needed by a Sagittarius-Capricorn, they may one day suffer a rude awakening when their beautiful creation comes down off its pedestal and, Pygmalion-like, walks away. Friendships between these two may not get very far, since Aries III's count on their friends for liveliness and enjoyment, and Sagittarius-Capricorn moods may be just too unpredictable. Sagittarius-Capricorns can actually be great fun, but when serious or withdrawn, they don't like to be disturbed. Furthermore, although Aries III's are capable of full commitment, they are put off by the sort of complaining and other forms of negativity of which Sagittarius-Capricorns are capable.

As parents, Aries III's are unlikely to be able to fathom the twists and turns of the Sagittarius-Capricorn personality, and may be simply too busy to supply the personal understanding such children need. But Sagittarius-Capricorn parents can have a strong physical bond with their Aries III children, encouraging them to excel in all sorts of strenuous activities and enthusiastically participating alongside them.

Sagittarius-Capricorns and Aries III's can work well together in projects that demand stamina and stick-to-it-iveness. Both have tremendous powers of concentration that enable them to work side by side with unflagging purpose. That determination might guarantee the success of a company or social organization.

ADVICE: Respect privacy. Don't try to play god. Some areas are better left alone. Be helpful but not overbearing. Be encouraging but not intrusive.

Little Fanfare

The success of this relationship will depend on whether it contains or can develop sensitivity and responsiveness. Aries III's and Capricorn I's are objectively well suited to collaborating as equal co-workers, or of forming a business as partners, but their combination entails a danger of power struggles, animosities and lost tempers. Situations in which one partner is the boss and the other the employee should be avoided whenever possible. Most Capricorn I's are authoritarian in nature, and Aries III's, who are dominant themselves, are unlikely to find them easy to live with, whether as partner or mate. Furthermore, these two probably won't experience the kind of deep feeling of love that could lead to a close personal relationship. Through hard work and firm resolve, however, they are capable of developing enough sensitivity and empathy to make them exceptions to the rule.

These two can be quite close friends, since both of them value honor and a straight-ahead, up-front approach, with little fanfare accompanying it. In their dynamism and imaginativeness, Aries III's will inspire Capricorn I's, and will serve as excellent examples of how to move ahead in the world. In turn, they will benefit from Capricorn I reliability and practicality, a good foil for their own tendency to become unrealistic and to fall out of touch with some of life's harsher realities. As long as power is not an issue, and sexual jealousy or social envy don't rear their ugly heads, the friendship is likely to be stimulating, physically invigorating and productive.

This relationship is likely to strain family bonds, whether sibling or parent-child. Aries III's and Capricorn I's are likely to engage in ongoing and intense fights for dominance, with neither winning any permanent victory. Both, however, are likely to grow strong from such confrontations, and they may develop some sensitivity to each other's needs. Although they are unlikely to understand or sympathize with each other deeply, they will reach a mutual respect for the relationship's power over the years and will fully appreciate it later in life.

CAPRICORN II

The Shape of Things

The keynote of this relationship is the establishment of firm guidelines and working operational structures. With this as a goal, a subtheme will be the exposure of weaknesses in the system, so that it may be repaired.

A Capricorn II who fixes on an Aries III for a partner will usually win out, no matter how unfortunate the choice. The question is really whether any structure or shape can be given to a relationship in which the Capricorn II basically just wants to tuck the Aries III away somewhere for his or her own private satisfaction—a cause of turmoil, for Aries III's are not very tuckable, and want to be socially in the eye of things. The best answer is usually to legalize the relationship, giving it a more palpable form. Marriages can succeed here, since both parties will usually be too busy with their own interests and careers to bother each other unduly. Children may not be recommended for these two unless they can decide beforehand who will take care of them.

This combination is less well suited for a career team, whether as business partners or co-workers. Conflicting ideas about organization and reorganization will abound, and attunement to reality will be low. Capricorn II's are prone to overestimate their capabilities and to be unable to deal with failure, which can be crippling to a project or business shared with an Aries III. Similarly, as family members, both partners will be too hardheaded to get along, but Aries III's can take the lead in being a bit more understanding and diplomatic.

Capricorn II's greatly need a special friend they can trust and with whom they can open up, and an honorable, protective and accepting Aries III may fit the bill nicely. Both of these friends like to work hard and play hard, so they are willing to invest time and effort in structuring a relationship in which they can sharpen their wits, by testing ideas on each other, and compete in challenging physical activities.

ADVICE: Learning to listen is a good first step. You are not infallible. Set things up carefully. Allow enough space. Use time efficiently.

CAPRICORN III

Furthering Mutual Interests

Strangely enough, although both Aries III's and Capricorn III's are dominant types, with each other they avoid power struggles in many areas. Sacrifice, service and flexibility are strong themes in this relationship, so that these two will go more than halfway to meet each other in most situations. Also, as long as both parties have their own areas of control, they don't need to rule the roost. Except when they are siblings or parent-child pairs, compromise between them is quite possible at home. When living together as lovers or spouses, this pair can make a powerfully effective team, joined in furthering both their individual and their mutual interests.

Friendships between these two are particularly favorable for Aries III's, who will benefit from the grounding and stable energies of Capricorn III's. But Capricorn III's will gain too, from exposure to Aries III ideas; they may even see their friend as their teacher. They must be careful not to idolize Aries III's unduly, however: in their weakness for hero worship, Capricorn III's tend to sell themselves short, making unfavorable comparisons between themselves and others. An understanding Aries III can help a Capricorn III come to grips with an inferiority complex that may be the result of harmful scripts learned in childhood. One difference between these two is that Capricorn III's, though hard on themselves, are not really needy of other people's approval, whereas Aries III's have a deep need to be told that they have made a difference. As lovers or family members, then, Capricorn III's will tend to be much more solitary than Aries III's.

When these two work alongside each other, issues of control and dominance can arise that will cause problems for the group. In acute cases it may be necessary to separate them. In many cases, however, Aries III's and Capricorn III's will inspire each other to new heights of achievement. Aries III's can have a good effect on Capricorn III's by encouraging them to take chances in advancing their careers rather than getting stuck in a boring or repetitive job.

ADVICE: Giving can make one richer, not poorer. Stay flexible. Be open to new endeavors. Sacrifice selfishness to mutual gain.

Forbidden Love

This relationship can be a secret (for example if it is a love affair), and quite enigmatic and unknown to the outside world. As lovers, Aries III's and Capricorn-Aquarians are likely to reach new romantic heights, with vivid and colorful emotional expression being the order of the day. What the relationship lacks in stability it will make up for in excitement, and Aries III energies can be a stabilizing force at home. Marriage may not be recommended for these two, since it tends to dull their passions, and indeed they have little reason to commit to it, unless moral or ethical reasons demand it. In fact forbidden love affairs in this combination can be rich and rewarding, at least until the partners are forced back down to earth.

Aries III–Capricorn-Aquarius friendships can be trying, since both these personalities are capable of being hasty and careless, which can wear down the relationship. Furthermore, Capricorn-Aquarians can get carried away with bursts of enthusiasm for this or that person, and Aries III's, more faithful by nature, may grow tired of their friendship being neglected or taken for granted.

In the family, Aries III parents will find their Capricorn-Aquarius children hard to control. Because they are not always realistic, they may not realize that they are trying to hold down a Capricorn-Aquarian wildness that is in fact a projection of their own suppressed and hidden desires. Siblings in this combination can live in a private fantasy world together, in which imaginative beings and situations come to have more meaning than does everyday life. When Aries III's become more interested in social matters, however, and acquire new friends, their Capricorn-Aquarian brother or sister may experience this as a painful abandonment.

Only certain careers lend themselves to this matchup, particularly those that value imagination, new ideas, entertainment, vivid marketing schemes or promotional programs. Assuming the business doesn't go broke in the first year, the relationship's chemistry can appeal to other people, attracting them to the product or service offered.

Intimate Pleasures

This relationship often focuses on intimacy. These two are on a common wavelength, so that successful friendships, love relationships and marriages are all possible for them. Aries III's are often fascinated by the talents and abilities of Aquarius I's, for whom they may serve as a stable, protective force.

Aquarius I's are free spirits, and the sooner Aries III's find this out the better. Aries III's too can be impulsive or impetuous on occasion but are usually surpassed in these qualities by Aquarius I's, whose lightning-like minds and movements tend to amaze one and all. Working relationships between these two are not really recommended, then, since Aquarius I's will have trouble keeping to the single plans or systems that idealistic Aries III's like to set up. Aries III parents, similarly, will be understanding with their Aquarius I children and will fulfill their needs for security, but will have to make an extra effort to accept these children's need for variety, vibrancy and change.

Despite the intimacy here, conventional marriages between these two are unlikely, since their needs and wants are so different. Unwilling to hang around the house while Aries III's are busy working with other people, for example, Aquarius I's usually see nothing wrong with having several other close personal relationships, perhaps even lovers, away from home. Aries III's, on the other hand, tend to be monogamous, and will only find what they need in someone else's arms if they are unhappy. Aquarius I's are not really as social or in need of human contact as they think they are, and once they realize this, wide gaps may appear between them and an Aries III partner.

An Aries III who is unhappy at home with a spouse or mate may find an unconventional Aquarius I lover irresistible. Despite the intimate pleasures of such a relationship, emotional volatility may quickly lead it to a chaotic, albeit exciting, finale. In more committed love affairs, the relationship's high sexual energy can be explosive and fulfilling.

Literal Integration

This relationship will not only call up starkly polarized character elements but, if it is to be successful, will demand their literal integration. Specifically, an Aries III relationship with an Aquarius II will have a double effect, albeit a contradictory one: first, it will sympathetically awaken either partner's slumbering child, and second, it will bring to life their somewhat stern though understanding adult. This bewildering manifestation may initially pose psychological problems for the relationship, but these opposite characters can later be successfully integrated in daily life, powerfully melding enthusiasm and responsibility.

Simply speaking, Aries III's and Aquarius II's can get right down in the sandbox together and have a wonderfully uninhibited time. Whether they be siblings, friends, lovers or a parent-child combination, their relationship can be fun. Equally, though, when either partner feels sandbox time is over, he or she may blow the whistle on a somewhat startled companion, or furiously start ringing the dinner or bedtime bell. Unless the relationship, whether friendship or marriage, can absorb such abrupt changes of attitude, over the long run they may prove intolerable, and a breakdown of harmonious and easy attitudes will urge a breakup.

The relationship does not usually place much priority on self-examination; this pair like to keep things light. Even if they do take the time to explore deeper emotional levels together, their relationship, though it may avoid some kinds of problems, may still fail to create the solid basis that is so necessary for it to survive times of difficulty or outright disaster. Friendships here tend to be of the fair-weather variety, and love affairs may be pleasant enough, but not necessarily lasting.

As a co-worker or business partner, the hard-driving Aries III is not always suited to the seemingly more relaxed Aquarius II. Furthermore, Aquarius II's dislike trouble so much that they may not be tough enough to engage in sharp negotiating or competition, and this, coupled with the often unrealistic financial attitudes of Aries III's, can spell disaster for any joint commercial enterprise or relationship.

ADVICE: Dig deeper. Investigate and integrate slowly and carefully. Don't forget to have fun, but clean up afterwards too. Difficulties demand resources.

THE WEEK OF ACCEPTANCE
 AQUARIUS III

Soft, Fleecy Clouds

This relationship is often dreamy and gentle in tone, fostering sympathy, kindness and supportiveness. It can go a long way through the sharing of physical and emotional experiences that are very important to personal development, and it can also be a great deal of fun. Its understanding and accepting attitudes are more likely to lead to friendships than to sensuous love affairs or marriages; magnetic sexual or emotional attractions are more unusual here than empathy, warmth and sharing.

Aquarius III's can be very emotionally needy growing up and can require a lot of attention. Rather than to their parents, they may well turn to Aries III friends and siblings, who have a tremendous capacity to give, and may be quite devoted to them and attentive to their needs. They may easily re-create this relationship in adult life, but limits may have to be drawn: guilelessly but shamelessly, Aquarius III's can be quite dependent and even parasitic, draining Aries III energies.

Looking back, adult Aries III's sometimes accuse an Aquarius III parent of having neglected them in childhood, when actually the parent was simply giving his or her children the freedom these personalities need. Aries III parents may also have conflicts with their Aquarius III children, who often feel resentment over what they perceive as parental disinterest in their feelings. Such children can envy or even hate the ideas and organizations to which their Aries III parents devote so much time and energy.

In marriages and business partnerships, or when this pair are co-workers on the same project, Aquarius III depressions and dark moods may weigh heavily on Aries III's. Aquarius III's, in turn, are prone to find Aries III's irritating, not necessarily for any good reason: for all their understanding, Aries III's have a way of triggering Aquarius III anger and temperament, even though Aquarius III's pride themselves on being cool on the job.

ADVICE: Express emotions, but don't let that mean losing your temper. Give and take, but don't take advantage. Develop emotional intelligence.

THE CUSP OF SENSITIVITY
AQUARIUS-PISCES CUSP

Born Again

The main concern of this relationship is often rebirth, which can require breaking through barriers and defenses built up over many years. Specifically at stake here is the reemergence of Aquarius-Pisces sensitivities and feelings. Aries III's, for example, may see the social problems of Aquarius-Pisces friends quite clearly, understanding that these individuals' combination of pessimism and cheerfulness holds them back from deep interaction and involvement. The choice rests with the Aries III: accept Aquarius-Pisces as they are, or risk rejection or being accused of a breach of friendship and try to get deeply involved, pushing the Aquarius-Pisces to express their true feelings and discover who they really are. If successful, Aries III's who take the plunge into the Aquarius-Pisces personality may reap rewards far beyond those of their own giving attitudes, for Aquarius-Pisces love and affection, so won, may lead to a deep, lasting and fulfilling relationship.

In areas of love and marriage, the relationship can demonstrate great calm and understanding, particularly in times of need. Yet this calm may be an aspect of a curious lack of deep feeling. If so, Aquarius-Pisces barriers will not be breached, and an opportunity for them to regain their lost childhood sensitivities will be denied. Also, Aquarius-Pisces will rarely be called upon to do prolonged battle with Aries III partners, a kind of conflict that might be unpleasant but would also give them a chance to forge a strong ego for themselves. Thus the kindness and attentiveness of the relationship, although immensely supportive, in the long run may not necessarily advance personal development. Principally concerned with either abstract or personal concerns, Aquarius-Pisces can neglect the middle ground of human experience: their relationships with others. Relationships with Aries III's, who are particularly strong in this area, may help them to build bridges to their fellow human beings. Rarely, however, will they come to trust Aries III mates, lovers or close family members enough to fulfill this role. They are more comfortable with Aries III co-workers, acquaintances, colleagues or, when young, more remote family members, all of whom will be less threatening than those who are emotionally closer to them.

ADVICE: Taking the plunge may be worth the risk. Dare to fail. Self-discovery carries rewards. Break through emotional barriers.

RELATIONSHIPS

Higher Ideals

The focus of this relationship is often aesthetic and idealistic. Aries III's and Pisces I's can make a wonderful team in service of higher ideals and beauty, particularly when they are both members of a social, spiritual or community group; both parties can be devotional types who need to put their energies into such projects, and the relationship can synergistically magnify their individual strengths severalfold.

Relationships between these two can develop out of one of these social groups. Although Aries III's tend to be more dynamic and aggressive and Pisces I's more relaxed and accepting, they initially appreciate each other's strong points. Both are self-sacrificing, and they should be aware that they can be taken advantage of by more selfish types.

Aries III's are passionate sorts who save their affections and their sexual urges for special intimate moments, while Pisces I's are more sensuous, needing to touch and taste the best that life has to offer in steady doses throughout the day. Because of these differences, love relationships and marriages may not be in the cards for these two. Platonic relationships in which sexuality is dormant or absent can be satisfying, lasting and, in the long run, quite satisfying for this combination, however.

Aries III–Pisces I siblings are likely to form strongly sympathetic and empathic bonds, particularly if they are of the opposite sex. But parent-child and other familial relations are likely to be strained, for these two employ quite different methods and tempos of working. Aries III's, for example, are the types who rise early and go straight to work, whereas Pisces I's may need a long time to wake up and get going. Then, at night, Aries III's may go early to bed, while Pisces I's tend to be night owls.

Because of its idealistic stance and its sometimes strong streak of unreality, this matchup is not recommended for business partnerships or other commercial projects. It can work well, however, in service, church, or other community-oriented endeavors.

ADVICE: First build a strong ego, then get rid of it. Give, but don't be treated like a football. Wake up to reality. Be interested in everyday matters.

Contact with the World

The main theme of this relationship is socialization. Pisces II's have an acute need for privacy and Aries III's need to surround themselves with people, so that their shared dealings with others will be a large issue. As a result, this combination is not generally a good one for marriage or living together. Yet should these two want to marry, each will have strong contributions to make (Pisces II's probably in the domestic sphere, Aries III's in the worldly or social sphere), as long as they can reach firm agreements as to how and when their living space is to be used by themselves and others.

Love relationships between these two may show abiding bonds of sympathy and affection but generally lack the searing emotion of full-blown love affairs. As friends, Aries III's will bring Pisces II's more into contact with the world, introducing them both to people and to potentially lucrative career opportunities. Aries III's have problems reaching their deeper feelings, and Pisces II's, masters at this, can help them to discover hidden and neglected areas of their psyches, just by insisting that they talk about how they feel. In this way Pisces II's can help Aries III friends live life much more deeply, making their relationships with others more meaningful and improving the quality of their social interactions. They can also give Aries III's the sympathy and emotional acceptance they need when they are misunderstood by their current spouse or lover. In return, Aries III friends can infuse Pisces II's with hope and inspiration when they feel bogged down in a stagnant or hopeless relationship.

These two can make an effective business team, with Pisces II's doing the inside work (planning, developing, producing) and their Aries III partner the outside work (PR, sales, marketing). As siblings, they can form a self-protective unit if exposed to unaccepting or abusive parents, teachers or other authority figures.

ADVICE: Decide how you want to organize your life. Keep in contact with the world. Don't neglect self-exploration. Settle differences.

The Emperor's New Clothes

This relationship is often a naive, even childlike one in which neither party really cares to understand the other at a deep level. Productive, lasting marriages and love affairs are rare in this combination, since these two often lack emotional, spiritual or physical maturity. They are often able to make objective and accurate psychological assessments, however, permitting them valuable insights. Like the child who saw the emperor naked in the fairy tale, they will maintain an atmosphere of honesty, although not always of comprehension or sympathy.

The Aries III ability to attract followers through teaching can arouse the jealousy of Pisces III's, who usually want nothing more than to affect their environment in this kind of way but have more difficulty doing so. Yet these two can form fast friendships, with admiration for each other's talent and ability playing an important role. In emotional areas, however, frustrations may emerge over an inability to share feelings at a deep level.

Although both parties have far-reaching ideas, Aries III's are more concerned with their fellow human beings and with society as a whole, Pisces III's with philosophical and universal concerns. In the family, an Aries III may see a Pisces III sibling as an unrealistic dreamer, taken up with cosmic, fantastic or New-Age pursuits, whereas a Pisces III may see an Aries III sibling as involved in messy interpersonal and idealistic endeavors that do not enhance personal growth. Aries III's may not have a great deal of respect for the Pisces III tendency to sink periodically into lethargy or self-pity and to be unable to advance their own cause.

At work, Pisces III technical skills and ability to make things happen can be of great value to Aries III associates. Aries III's have no end of ideas but are not always able to put them into practice; this is where Pisces III's can help. They often also have better financial judgment than their Aries III partners and will generally know where money is well spent and where it is wasted. It is at work that this relationship's objective and frank brand of honesty will be most valued.

ADVICE: Retain a childlike openness, but deepen feelings. Develop mature relationships. Lessen unfavorable comparisons. Share and accept.

Lowering Your Guard

Since the ability to lower their guard when in the company of someone like themselves is a great relief to both of these powerhouses, this relationship is likely to be fairly relaxed and comfortable—to a point. Curiously enough, these two strong-minded individuals often get along quite well, since they mutually respect each other and know that outright combat between them would be folly. Yet they rarely get involved with each other as lovers or mates. And if they do get married (slowly, deliberately and carefully), they are likely to lack the ability or the desire to share domestic, financial and familial power. A love affair between two Aries-Tauruses can be comforting, since they know what to expect from each other, but those born on the Cusp of Power are more attracted to, and more satisfied by, partners very different from themselves.

Friendships here can work well as long as they don't demand daily contact. Shared activities, including just talking and updating each other on personal news, can be relaxing and fun for this pair. Two Aries-Tauruses can provide each other with mutual support and advice, but the relationship usually runs smoothest if they don't do the same work or share the same expertise. They are likewise ill-advised to work together; a co-worker or business-partner relationship is likely to arouse conflict and even confrontation. These two can make formidable opponents and enemies if working for rival organizations, or as direct financial or business competitors. Such confrontations usually have only one winner.

As family members, whether in sibling or parent-child relationships, Aries-Tauruses are likely to engage in ongoing power struggles with each other unless they can work out a modus vivendi involving mutual respect and acceptance.

ADVICE: Build bonds of respect. Don't expect too much from each other. Enjoy fun activities. Keep it light. Avoid conflicts and confrontations.

A Safe Haven

A relationship between these two will tend to be intense, private and conflicted. The safest way for the matchup to work is by keeping focused on a base, such as a home, where Aries-Tauruses and Taurus I's will be capable of sharing a private, dependable and secure relationship.

Although truly comfortable, Aries-Taurus-Taurus I love affairs are usually fleeting, due to a lack of deep emotion coupled with occasional irritation and miscommunication. Yet marriages between these two can work; domestic harmony is quite possible in this combination. As spouses these two will have few surprises for each other and will find the security of knowing exactly what to expect quite comforting, albeit sometimes dull. At home, Taurus I's can be quite happy supervising the day-to-day running of things while leaving Aries-Tauruses the boss in making the larger, more strategic decisions, particularly of a financial nature, or in matters of design and taste. In this way both partners can be quite content. Their mutual capacity for stubbornness, however, can be divisive; they would both do well to learn to give in.

Aries-Taurus-Taurus I friendships can be dependable havens in times of need, not only for the partners themselves but for others. These two can share physical activities such as sports, hiking, swimming and other challenging outdoor projects with great satisfaction, whether as a team or as friendly opponents. Sibling and parent-child relationships in this combination can also work well, with each party providing mutual support and sympathy for the other. The reliability and dependability of such relationships often allow them to outlast the boundaries of childhood and adolescence and to persist well into adult life or old age.

Working relationships between Aries-Tauruses and Taurus I's can be quite satisfactory as long as roles are well defined and differentiated, and as long as power struggles don't surface, particularly involving career advancement. Since neither of these personalities will usually bite the hand that feeds them, they will rarely cause problems that affect the smooth running of their group or organization, which here serves effectively as the home base.

Creature Comforts

Love affairs here feature a lot of sensuousness and physical attraction. But both Aries-Tauruses and Taurus II's are usually attracted to types far different from themselves, so that their earthy ties, although enjoyable, may not sustain their relationship in the long run. The relationship emphasizes accumulation: saving and investing are keynotes here, as are the collection, discussion and sharing of beautiful objects. What these things have in common, or what they represent or symbolize to both partners, is very simply security. For Aries-Tauruses, security is a form of power; for Taurus II's, it is the freedom to go into the world and give of themselves; for both it is a necessary foundation.

Marriages between these two can be highly successful, enhancing both parties' natural impulse to contribute. Their home will be a pleasant and stimulating place for one and all, full not only of the creature comforts that make life worth living but of culture—ideas, books, music, art. Parent-child relationships can also be rewarding and secure, but friendships may work less well. Taurus II's pick friends from all walks of life, including disadvantaged communities, while Aries-Tauruses have a tendency to be a little snobbish, preferring to hobnob with the powerful and successful. This will usually preclude these two from sharing a social group, and unless they have a common hobby—collecting antiques, for example—they may simply not move in the same circles.

The idealism of many Taurus II's may prevent them from working comfortably alongside Aries-Tauruses, who are usually interested in monetary return and career advancement. In fact, Taurus II's are often ambivalent about Aries-Tauruses, admiring their moneymaking skills yet at the same time resenting their mercenariness. Taurus II's may know well enough how to make and spend money, but they believe in unselfish service and may spend their time working for people or causes that Aries-Tauruses just don't find worth the effort.

TAURUS III

A Need for Honesty

The central need in this combination is honesty. Each of these personalities has an unerring sense of truth, and their relationship demands honesty from both of them on every level, especially those of the deepest emotion. Given honesty, the relationship will have a secure and stable foundation; without it, the partners are liable to feel frustrated and used. Powerful Aries-Tauruses, especially, are instinctively prone to seeing through any ruse.

Taurus III's may so badly want an objectively honest friend who can be depended on in times of stress that they look to Aries-Tauruses to fill needs far beyond the ordinary demands of friendship—the ability to share good times and pleasures. Aries-Tauruses, for their part, will value the natural, uninhibited responses of Taurus III's, which, although often unsettling, are also honest—Aries-Tauruses will like knowing where they stand. Not only are these two truthful with each other, they surround themselves with people who are straight-shooters.

An Aries-Taurus parent or mate can be a rock of security in an otherwise chaotic life, but Taurus III's hate to be told what to do or how to be, and should they think the Aries-Taurus too didactic, they may rebel. Aries-Tauruses, then, must be extremely understanding of their Taurus III lover's need to express themselves with others. If they see the Taurus III as fickle or unfaithful, and respond with blame or punishment, the Taurus III may see them as straitlaced and oppressive. Taurus III's are easily bored and are attracted to oddball situations, and if Aries-Tauruses refuse to accept their need for variety, and Taurus III's refuse to change their ways, marriage between these two may prove difficult to impossible. An open exchange of feelings and ideas can go a long way toward averting these kinds of problems. As parents, Aries-Tauruses can prove rather stern with Taurus III children, while a Taurus III parent may not provide the solid and constant support needed by an Aries-Taurus child. At work, similarly, Aries-Tauruses are usually most concerned with the good of the group or project and, therefore, may be judgmental about what they see as waywardness on the part of a Taurus III.

ADVICE: Revealing the truth isn't always wise. Stay alert to the needs of others. Think, sometimes, before you react. You always pay the price.

Gaping in Amazement

This relationship offers many insights. It can teach valuable lessons to its partners, enhancing their consciousness. Family and friends may gape in amazement as two individuals whom they see as having little in common build a fulfilling life together. Moreover, these two will share what they have learned as a couple with others, often simply by example.

The combination is excellent for both marriage and friendship: Aries-Tauruses will provide the stability and dedication that Taurus-Gemini need, and Taurus-Gemini will contribute the interest and excitement required by Aries-Tauruses. Aries-Tauruses know what they want, and if what they want is a fascinating Taurus-Gemini, they will make the relationship happen through sheer force of will. Happily, Taurus-Gemini are often agreeable to being chosen, seeing many advantages in a permanent relationship with such a powerful and capable partner.

In love affairs (and sometimes, strong as the combination is in this area, in marriages), differences in style may require adjustments that will often be necessitated by a possibly painful lesson. Taurus-Gemini are usually too fickle to commit to a single love relationship, and Aries-Tauruses, with their strong instincts for self-protection and survival, are unlikely to be masochistic enough to humiliate themselves in order to hold onto their partner. Faced with an ultimatum to be faithful, Taurus-Gemini may try to comply, with partial success. They may also decide that closing their roving eye isn't really worth the effort. Working relationships in this combination may go well in certain specialized cases, namely when Taurus-Gemini are the innovators and Aries-Tauruses the shapers and redirectors of their efforts. Otherwise, the differences in tempo between these two (Aries-Taurus steady and sure, Taurus-Gemini flashing bolts of inspiration) could undermine the team or lead to accusation and recrimination. If these difficulties are overcome, however, this can be the model of a complementary partnership. As parents, Aries-Tauruses may prove too controlling for their Taurus-Gemini offspring, and Taurus-Gemini too weak to control their willful Aries-Taurus children.

ADVICE: Get your priorities straight. Sacrifice and compromise will be necessary. Don't be so hardheaded. Learn to listen and profit by errors.

Reaping the Whirlwind

To say that this relationship can be problematical is an understatement. Aries-Taurus is ruled by fire and earth, Gemini I by air, but it is on the area of feelings (represented by the fourth element, water) that the relationship is focused. And it is precisely the emotional chemistry of the combination that goes periodically out of whack, often at points where things seem to be going well. When these two are mates, lovers or siblings, one unfortunate remark, omission or sign of neglect is enough to raise the temperature of the other partner to the boiling point.

This chemistry is exacerbated by the significant differences in the partners' personal style. Gemini I's think and move with amazing speed; Aries-Tauruses need time and refuse to be rushed. Thus Gemini I's can quickly grow frustrated with their partner's measured stance, which makes Aries-Tauruses just dig in their heels all the more. Aries-Tauruses, meanwhile, can grow nervous around Gemini I's, and if so, the bristly rejection they exhibit will just make things worse. In general, Aries-Tauruses tend to be long-suffering, while Gemini I's are more volatile and judgmental. A lack of tact and diplomacy on both sides can escalate existing animosities, particularly in marriage and family. Even though each party can have the best interests of the other at heart, when buttons are pushed, both tend to lash out, only regretting their behavior later—perhaps much later. As lovers, these two may have a whirlwind romance, replete with out-of-control passion, wide emotional swings, and highly expressive outbursts. Before too long, it will probably burn itself out.

Working relationships are often best for this pair, since the synergy of their powers of application to a given project and their concentration on getting it done can be considerable. But unless they agree from the start on their goals, and on what function each partner will play, their projects can founder and break up on the rocks.

ADVICE: Try to calm down. Learn emotional control. Don't allow your temper to be triggered so easily. Try to be objective. See the good side.

Natural Sympathies

This relationship is at its best when feelings can flow and experiences can be shared most naturally. It is characterized by appreciation and sympathy, particularly in times of need. Oddly comfortable with each other, these two could begin to suspect that they've known each other before, as though they'd been friends over many lifetimes. The relationship is at its most expressive when the partners spend time in nature, away from societal pressures—perhaps at a country home, on vacation or during a walk in the woods.

Sparkling Gemini II's may help to lift Aries-Taurus' darker moods with entertainment and fun, and their vivaciousness and unique viewpoints will prove attractive to this partner. Quiet and serious, Aries-Taurus may for their part intrigue Gemini II's as projections of their own shadow side. They can also be good counselors to Gemini II's, who can often benefit from business, social or marital partnerships with more practical and reliable types, such as Aries-Taurus. In such relationships, Gemini II's may contribute new and original ideas that Aries-Taurus implement through their command of the organizational skills necessary for a family, club or business. But the relationship is usually weighted in the Gemini II's favor, with the Aries-Taurus, unfortunately, doing most of the giving and the Gemini II most of the taking. Easy friendships are probably the best bet for these two; in love relationships and marriages, Gemini II superficiality may ultimately irritate or hurt Aries-Taurus, and their endless stream of chatter can prove a turnoff romantically.

Aries-Taurus parents may have little understanding of their Gemini II children, whom they may see as flaky or irresponsible. Their domination in this relationship, particularly when the child is of the same sex, may create frustration: the child will need to identify with them as a role model, but will be unable to do so because of strong underlying differences in temperament.

ADVICE: Try to understand your own frustrations. Minimize needs and demands. Keep it light. Retrench by periodically getting away from it all.

Revolutionary Charm

This quirkily charming combination can exert a magnetic influence over others. Not only is the relationship itself unusually seductive, it brings out the charisma in its participants. Influencing others is therefore a keynote here. In addition, hidden behind this couple's charming facade there may lurk a revolutionary zeal, which will often surprise its participants as they jointly embark on upsetting the apple cart.

Aries-Taurus will value the way the relationship enhances their charm and thereby their personal power or magnetism. Gemini III's also enjoy motivating others, and though often the more charming of these two to begin with, they won't mind being part of a charismatic couple. Aries-Taurus, on the other hand, will feel most uncomfortable with any kind of change within the relationship, but will happily become a provocateur or instigator if the goal is an increase in power. Gemini III's admire Aries-Taurus' powerful approach to career matters and to the world in general, while Aries-Taurus will enjoy hearing about a Gemini III partner's latest adventure or exploit. But Gemini III's, as children, have a tendency to idolize an authority figure who will inevitably let them down, and if, as adults, they project such feelings onto a capable Aries-Taurus spouse or lover, a complex emotional situation may arise.

If Aries-Taurus prove unresponsive to Gemini III needs over the years of a long-lasting love affair or marriage, the Gemini III will often rebel by seeking solace and affection outside the primary relationship, even while staying committed to it. This can work all right as long as the liaisons are kept discreet and hidden from the Aries-Taurus partner, who would probably rather not know anyway. Particularly in marriages, Gemini III's may seem to be dependent on Aries-Taurus practicality, but in fact they are excellent with money and may subtly guide the family's financial fortunes. Because of their mutual appreciation of each other's strong points, companionships and friendships between these two can work out excellently.

ADVICE: Analyze all the consequences before you act. Develop mutual values. Beware of psychological projection. If you can, be honest.

Energy Flow

The keynote of this relationship is energy. Like many cusp people, both Aries-Tauruses and Gemini-Cancers tend to be extreme, all-or-nothing types; their energies, when well directed, can produce extraordinary results, and when misdirected bring chaos. The predominant energies in this relationship are two-fold: it highlights both the physical, with sensuousness becoming a form of communication, and the verbal, with lively conversation emphasized.

Marriages, love relationships and friendships between these two can work. Gemini-Cancers will bring out the more private side of Aries-Tauruses, and the duo will undoubtedly spend most of their time alone together, rather than socializing with friends or visiting with family. Shared intimacies can be very special in this relationship, which is strong in empathy, nurturing and protectiveness.

The energy within the relationship will always need to be channeled toward constructive aims, so the planning of activities and outlets can prove important. Also, differences in temperament will need to be kept in check. Gemini-Cancers, for example, are extremely picky about how they are approached, spoken to, touched and, of course, made love to. If Aries-Tauruses are insensitive to such matters, their love affairs with Gemini-Cancers are unlikely to last long. On the other hand, Aries-Taurus passion is of the more robust and literal sort, and the nuanced and ethereal treatment they get from Gemini-Cancers may not be solid or substantial enough to satisfy them.

Because of differences in value systems (Aries-Tauruses generally being interested in power and wealth, Gemini-Cancers in love and personal matters), this combination may not be recommended for working or business relationships; nor do sibling and parent-child relationships usually work out well. There is a certain guardedness and mistrust between these two: Gemini-Cancers may find Aries-Tauruses pushy and aggressive, while Aries-Tauruses may find Gemini-Cancers secretive and sneaky.

ADVICE: Keep energies flowing smoothly. Work on blockages. Widen understanding of individual differences. Develop sympathetic and accepting attitudes.

THE WEEK OF THE EMPATH

A Struggle for Independence

In the most favorable scenario, this relationship will involve a rebellion against domination, a process that can stimulate personal growth. Aries-Tauruses, for example, can be rather overbearing with more sensitive Cancer I's, who will accept such attitudes for a while and then will revolt, perhaps slowly gaining momentum in their struggle and then emerging as full-fledged and independent personalities. Thus a negative beginning may produce a positive result here.

In many love relationships and marriages, however, Cancer I's are far too sensitive and fearful to stand up to Aries-Taurus dominance. Initially, in fact, it may even be very difficult for them to figure out how to approach an Aries-Taurus, let alone actually do so. If Aries-Tauruses set romantic sights on Cancer I's, on the other hand, even only temporarily, Cancer I's will bask in the warmth of Aries-Taurus attention and affection, never allowing themselves to face the possibility that they are being played with or used, and that the next step may be the exit. As spouses, these two often make a bad combination, since Aries-Tauruses will grow impatient with the moods and what they perceive as the ineffectual or misguided actions of Cancer I's, while Cancer I's will eventually either resent or become too dependent on Aries-Tauruses' presence and support.

Close friendships in this combination are unlikely, due to personality clashes. But easy acquaintanceships, featuring the sharing of observations about common endeavors, may prove enlightening and stimulating. And working relationships between these two can be quite successful, being a synergetic product of Cancer I technical expertise and financial strengths and Aries-Taurus initiative and steadfastness. Both parties know well the value of money, with a constructive balance being struck between the Aries-Taurus urge to spend and the Cancer I need to save. Arguments will undoubtedly arise, since both may exhibit a know-it-all attitude, but if personal irritations, dislikes and animosities can be kept under control, the relationship is likely to survive.

A Relaxing Escape

At its best, this relationship can be an interesting respite from the world; these two may find freshness and joy in its stimulating conversation, shared activities or challenges, and ongoing movement. But the participants should be warned that commitment, structure and responsibility are not the norm here.

Cancer II's may not find much of interest in the more predictable, less subtle Aries-Taurus personality; they usually seek out far more unusual types. And when these two are lovers, Aries-Taurus conventionality and earthy passion are usually a bit boring to a Cancer II. Meanwhile, though Aries-Taurus may be quite fascinated with Cancer II's, they are unlikely to choose such eccentricity for a deeper relationship. Nor are the kinkier and more bizarre characteristics of the Cancer II sexual makeup usually a stimulus to Aries-Taurus. In some cases, however, more far-out Aries-Taurus tastes will integrate well with Cancer II's wide sexual palette.

Marriages between these two can work only as long as traditional expectations of the marriage contract are left at the door. Also, Aries-Taurus must learn to tolerate the eccentric and often outlandish Cancer II preferences in interior decorating and lifestyle. Since Aries-Taurus generally have balanced, Venusian tastes, demanding harmony and beauty (rather than outlandishness) in their surroundings, these two are unlikely to be able to live together comfortably.

Friendships in this combination are definitely possible. Aries-Taurus will appreciate the vivid fantasy of their Cancer II friends, and will look forward to their time together as a relaxing escape from their all-too-predictable daily lives. Cancer II's, on the other hand, will benefit from Aries-Taurus worldliness, practical expertise and advice. An effective mutual support system may emerge here, as long as feelings of desire or envy do not manifest in one of the friends. This is generally true for siblings of this combination as well.

ADVICE: Getting closer may involve giving up some freedom. Learn to share. Cultivate common endeavors. Look for more points of connection.

THE WEEK OF THE PERSUADER

Sagacious Advice

Especially in marriage and work, this relationship can be original, creative and effective, emphasizing both independence and responsibility. Strength and power are prominent themes: both partners have an acute need for these qualities, and can supply them to each other in the form of support, wisdom and counsel. If common goals are defined, roles delineated and imaginative approaches agreed upon, this can be a hardworking, dedicated team. Together, however, these two must be careful not to exhibit smothering, bossy or overbearing attitudes toward children and employees.

Love relationships in this combination may be problematic. Although Cancer III's are persuasive, formidable and often attractive personalities, Aries-Taurus will build up an immunity to their powers of seduction over the years. Highly passionate individuals, Cancer III's can lash out in fits of temper, anger or jealousy. This can be extremely unpleasant for Aries-Taurus, who can take a great deal but only up to a point—that being, usually, the point where they feel their peace and well-being are threatened. On the other hand, the Aries-Taurus lack of emotional sensitivity can ultimately be a major problem for Cancer III's, who require a partner who understands their emotional nature. Should these two settle into a marriage, these issues may be overcome as common goals take precedence over them. Friendships and work relationships between Aries-Taurus and Cancer III's can bring lasting value and mutual benefit over the years. Sharing personal matters and giving sagacious advice and sympathetic help, not only to each other but to family, friends and colleagues, are specialties here. Nor is this relationship a fair-weather one—it will survive both the best and the worst of times. Work partnerships here can be especially fruitful, as few have the business acumen of these two.

Should either of these partners be a parent to the other, he or she will be nurturing and caring, and the child will be appreciative. One danger, however, is that too close a parent-child bond could undermine the personal growth of both personalities.

ADVICE: Allow for more individual expression. Accept others as they are. Back off and let it be. You are neither indispensable nor infallible.

Keeping Lines Open

Aries-Taurus and Cancer-Leo cusps are square to each other (90° apart in the zodiac), and as such, in traditional astrology, are not expected to get along. Indeed conflict can be a hallmark of this relationship. The principal challenge here is that of open dialogue—whether there is enough communication to allow meaningful interaction to take place. It could be that these two will need to work out their own unique way of communicating. This requires time and energy, of course—harder investments for Cancer-Leo than for Aries-Taurus.

Cancer-Leos' hankering after instability and danger probably won't lead them into love affairs with Aries-Taurus partners, whom they may find much too sensible and practical. They instinctively find romance with unpredictable and impulsive types, who mirror their own manic side; a love relationship with a more stable Aries-Taurus may actually come much closer to what they really need, but will unfortunately fall short of what they think they want. Similarly, Cancer-Leos are likely to find Aries-Tauruses unsympathetic and uncommunicative as marriage partners. Aries-Tauruses can in turn grow impatient with their Cancer-Leo spouse's need for variety and excitement, and may even regard it as a personal affront. Both these partners may hang on to a relationship long after it has failed. The Cancer-Leo, however, is more likely to seek solace or distraction outside the marriage through involvements with more unstable types, further destabilizing the relationship.

In family settings, particularly as parents, Aries-Tauruses may prove a steadying influence on Cancer-Leos, although they can also be inhibiting and judgmental, or at least be perceived as such. Cancer-Leo children may find it difficult to be themselves here, since showing mood swings, or moving from more active to more passive roles and back again, can meet with parental displeasure. At work, Cancer-Leos have to interact with people who understand them, and are sympathetic while highly pragmatic. Aries-Tauruses usually have little time on the job to spend catering to other people's feelings.

ADVICE: Admitting failure or defeat from time to time is positive. Be more sympathetic, but also more realistic. Be inventive in opening lines of communication.

Fierce Struggles

This relationship is likely to be hard-driving and expansive. Both of these types are ambitious, but Leo I's can top even Aries-Tauruses in their drive for success. The easygoing side of Aries-Tauruses has to be satisfied from time to time, but this relationship will give them little rest. Because they can find Leo I demands annoying, the combination is unlikely to work out as a friendship. Moreover, the selfishness of each partner is augmented here, so that the easy give-and-take necessary in any friendship is likely to be absent.

As lovers, these two can have intense sexual encounters, but the relationship may not develop into a deep or lasting one. Each partner may try to control the other, and there are likely to be elements of combat and competition, up to and including displays of anger and jealousy. In Aries-Taurus-Leo I marriages these tendencies may become secondary as other areas of the relationship assume equal importance with sex—namely, prestige, social and financial status, and career advancement. Children of this combination may at times feel unappreciated for their own selves, sensing that they are being used or shown off as prestige objects. The marriage may be highly successful in the eyes of the world, and productive as far as the partners are concerned, but it will rarely contribute to their emotional or spiritual growth.

As young people, Aries-Tauruses need parental attention and input, but they are unlikely to get it from Leo I parents. Yet Leo I's are very loyal, and will seldom neglect their children financially. Siblings of this combination, particularly of the same sex, will engage in ferocious struggles while growing up, but later, as young adults, may pull together during tough times, making themselves the bulwark of the family group.

Aries-Tauruses and Leo I's are unlikely to collaborate well as co-workers, since each will be too concerned with personal advancement. Envy and outright sabotage cannot be ruled out in such a situation. If these two are the heads of rival businesses, or competitive freelancers, the relationship may be adversarial.

ADVICE: Be more open and honest. Say what's on your mind. Beware of sneaky activities. Make reasonable demands. Expect participation and help.

THE WEEK OF BALANCED STRENGTH
LEO II

Enterprising Explorers

Appearing in the areas of work or marriage, this relationship can flourish through a variety of challenging endeavors. Its keynote is the search for opportunity and growth, and then the use of them, in the most enterprising way. As a unit, these two can prove successful in any area that interests them. The combination is faithful and hard-working, and it avoids failure. But there is a downside to this, since an unwillingness to admit defeat can make the relationship go on longer than it sometimes should.

Aries-Taurus and Leo II's are a match for each other in strength of character. These two measured individuals can go far in establishing a successful enterprise. Ego conflicts can be expected to arise here in love affairs and romances, but marriages can be extremely stable: each party has the ability to stick with it in difficult times, and the relationship itself provides enough variety, and enough concern for family, to make it all worthwhile. This combination will also make reassuring parents for young children, who will feel protected and cared for. As adolescents, though, the children of this marriage may provide firestorms if either parent proves unresponsive to their needs and wants.

Aries-Taurus and Leo II's can make fast and faithful, tender and caring friends provided that they aren't distracted by some area of competition, ranging from a desired person to a job. Leo II's are usually more private in their friendships, and Aries-Taurus more social, but if the Leo II demands more time away from crowds and mutual friends, the Aries-Taurus is likely to go along. Sharing sports activities, whether as participant or spectator, and going on vacations together are characteristic of this relationship, and satisfy its need for exploration and adventure.

Business partnerships or working combinations here are likely to be very successful; this matchup creates a team that will constantly be searching for ways to improve and expand its market.

ADVICE: Rivalry is counterproductive. Line up on the same side. Follow your dreams. Pursue the search for excellence. Give up on unworkable tasks.

LEO III

Dishing It Out

This relationship is likely to appear and feel immense to its partners—probably too much so for them to be comfortable in it. As a result, each person will erect defenses that will actually only contribute to the relationship's perceived magnitude. Interactions will be intense, with clashes the standard mode. Each partner is quite capable of dishing it out. One way of managing the scale of the relationship is to broaden its area of influence, giving it a wider theater; limiting it to a small domestic sphere is bound to result in a clash of titans.

Leo III's are tough to get close to emotionally, and Aries-Taurus may have to win their hearts slowly, first gaining their trust and admiration. Their hot passions will flare often, but although they tend to discard old lovers as easily as banana peels, they may find it harder to get rid of an Aries-Taurus—a tough cookie who usually refuses to be treated badly or talked down to without a fight. In combat these two are a match for each other, each giving as good as they get. Fortunately, they will also give back what they get in the more positive aspect of mutual nurturing.

A powerful business or marital partnership between these two can be worked out in which there is a coalescence between the Leo III ability to further the action and the Aries-Taurus knack for handling the home base. When Leo III, the irresistible force, and Aries-Taurus, the immovable object, combine synergetically, the matchup may prove nearly invincible—unless it is rocked by internal dissent. Sexual, emotional and territorial considerations heighten the chances of such conflict arising in marriage. Business partnerships have a better chance of success.

Parent-child and sibling relationships in this combination, particularly between members of the same sex, are likely to be fraught with conflict and disagreement. These two will vie for nothing less than supremacy in the family unit.

ADVICE: Take the easier way sometimes. Compromise and diplomacy can be a great relief. Surrender is often more pleasurable than battering.

A Retreat into Fantasy

This combination can prove profound and private. The relationship has a secret life that has very little to do with ordinary reality; imagination and fantasy figure prominently here. Yet both partners are quite pragmatic, so that over the long term one would expect the relationship to become uncomfortable for them. Leo-Virgos, however, will probably enjoy its secretive nature.

Both Aries-Tauruses and Leo-Virgos will generally apply hard work to difficult situations, but hard work is not the answer in this nebulous matchup. Leo-Virgos do not reveal themselves easily, moreover, and demand a lot of understanding; this Aries-Tauruses may be unwilling to supply, for they don't like secretive or misleading behavior, mistrust magic and miracles, and are apt to have little patience for what they see as Leo-Virgo game playing, illusion and ego massage. Love and marriage, then, are unlikely to be successful in this combination, despite the possibility of a romantic infatuation, uncharacteristic for both parties, at the relationship's start.

According to conventional astrology, Leo-Virgos and Aries-Tauruses are well suited to each other; their balance of fire and earth (Leo and Aries are fire signs, Virgo and Taurus earth signs) suggests that they have traits in common. It may be, however, that these very traits lead them into conflict. Both Virgos and Tauruses are materially oriented, for example, but Tauruses are more lavish and Virgos more selective, so that their financial orientation is very different. Still, in a friendship or companionship that permits a sharing of ideas and talents, these differences can be worked out, or can meld synergetically. In familial and working relationships, these two are likely to disagree over methodology. Where Leo-Virgos usually feel that the end justifies the means, Aries-Tauruses may be more severe in their ethics. Furthermore, Leo-Virgos are likely to hide their real intentions, or to retreat into fantasy, which can anger and frustrate Aries-Tauruses. This relationship will be most successful as a creative partnership emphasizing imagination, fantasy and role-playing.

ADVICE: Investigating something before getting involved in it may be worth the time and trouble. Unify your financial orientation. Loosen up.

THE WEEK OF SYSTEM BUILDERS
VIRGO I

A Catalytic Influence

Responsible, measured behavior, accompanied by a well-defined chain of command, is likely to be prominent in this relationship. The general tone here is one of weight and seriousness; anything even approaching frivolity will be unheard of.

Love affairs in this combination are likely to be less than inspiring, and Aries-Tauruses and Virgo I's who engage in them probably do so because they are looking for something they can rely on. Aries-Taurus-Virgo I marriages can indeed be very solid. They are characterized by hard work, with a good feeling for order and structure at home. The same goes for the matchup when it occurs in the workplace. The relationship may be rigid, however, in the application of principles and work methods, and this can have a stultifying effect on more creative energies, particularly in marriages. There is also a danger that others in the household, while benefiting from this combination's orderliness, may ultimately find its inflexible rules oppressive, and be forced to rebel against them.

Even so, Aries-Tauruses can be excellent role models for Virgo I's, particularly as friends or parents. Aries-Taurus strength, assurance and career success can have a catalytic influence on a Virgo I's approach to the world, which otherwise tends to be that of an observer rather than a participant. Although they rarely become as aggressive as Aries-Tauruses, Virgo I's can be inspired by this relationship to go for it.

Aries-Taurus-Virgo I working relationships can be highly satisfactory as long as Aries-Taurus is in the driver's seat, which is fine with Virgo I's, who are well able to work as part of a team and are unlikely to cause problems for an Aries-Taurus boss. Structure is a strong point with Virgo I's, and Aries-Tauruses will appreciate their ability to solve problems and straighten out inefficient or chaotic situations. A Virgo I who analyzes, writes reports and recommendations, and in general serves in an advisory capacity will be of tremendous value to any Aries-Taurus section leader, boss or executive.

ADVICE: Try to stay flexible. Strictness can arouse opposition. Give energy to group efforts. Be understanding of the needs of others.

Domestic Tranquillity

This relationship tends to bring out the domestic side of both partners. Privacy is of prime importance here, and with it a quiet intimacy, removed from the unrelenting pressures of the world. Both partners welcome the relaxed atmosphere this relationship affords them when they walk in the door, with Aries-Taurus particularly benefiting from a low-key attitude at home. Being able to leave workaday stresses behind can literally be a lifesaver for both parties.

As lovers, these two may have a deep physical bond. Should their passionate relationship work out, it is likely to move toward a more permanent living situation or marriage, since neither partner enjoys living alone. Aries-Taurus–Virgo II friendships can also go very deep. Indeed, lovers and spouses in this combination can usually continue to be friends even after an unfortunate breakup.

Aries-Taurus are naturally attracted to unusual, enigmatic individuals like Virgo II's. Offbeat humor and an openness to sexual experimentation, even at times to the kinky, kooky or bizarre in relationships with other couples, lend spice and excitement to love affairs and marriages. Yet as siblings or other family members, Aries-Taurus and Virgo II's can find each other irritating and stressful, and may rarely be able to agree without friction surfacing. Both partners will have to work hard on making their relationship less judgmental and condemnatory if the family is to have peace.

Because these two are extremely strong-minded, powerful individuals, a working relationship between them is unlikely to be easy. Power struggles inevitably arise here, but if boundaries and tasks are well defined, effective work for the good of the group is possible.

ADVICE: Find a balance between tranquillity and excitement. Keep negative tendencies under control. Give others peace. Ease frictions a bit.

A Practical Modus Vivendi

This is a very determined relationship; knowing what is wanted and how to get it are high priorities here. It is a combination that is only interested in the material world and the practical aspects of life. Any sort of deeper feelings, sensitivity or emotion will be given short shrift here.

Both Aries-Taurus and Virgo III's have a strongly selfish side, and their relationship only magnifies this tendency. After meeting a few times, each of these two will have little doubt that they have met a formidable opponent, one with at least as much will and survival instinct as they. Virgo III's are an interesting blend of conservative and iconoclast, and Aries-Taurus, particularly in the early stages of the relationship, may bring out their rebelliousness: they are extremely sensitive about injustice and high-handedness in all forms, and can be disturbed by Aries-Taurus snobbism and other forms of social pretension. If necessary, however, these two will work out a highly practical modus vivendi, as soon as both realize that it is in their mutual interest to do so.

In friendships and love affairs, Aries-Taurus will come to respect the critical powers and common sense of Virgo III's, who for their part will appreciate the sound judgment and effective actions of Aries-Taurus. But when these two are lovers, power struggles between them—who will rule the roost?—may never lie far beneath the surface. Sharp anger and outright battling are more likely than continual bickering, since no time is wasted here on trivialities; instead, combative energies are saved for larger issues. Compromise is rare here, and a third party may sometimes be required to settle the relationship's disputes.

Although marriage can be attempted in this combination, the couple's inability to relate well on a day-to-day basis makes it unlikely to work out. These two may be sexually compatible, but the bonds of sympathy and feeling that might sustain the relationship are unlikely to develop.

In careers and at work, these two can be a formidable duo. Their relationship will be based on mutual trust and need, and they will rely on and consult each other on important matters.

ADVICE: Respect born out of struggle is usually longer lasting. Put limits on selfishness. Work for the common good. Learn to compromise.

A Conventional Facade

The central focus of this relationship is often aesthetic, especially in its penchant for highly personal taste in surroundings, clothes, furnishings and manners. A highly private and perhaps unconventional home life may be hidden behind a more conventional facade. Both partners instinctively appreciate the good things of the material world and the value of money, a talent that the relationship will enhance. When these two are spouses, or partners in a business or other common enterprise, a strong bond may exist between them.

The relationship has a strong sensuous side, and can be deeply physical when these two are lovers—as long as it starts out with a strong attraction. Excessive attention and affection also indicate a darkly addictive tendency, probably hidden to the world; emotionally the relationship can have an unhealthy aspect. Despite these obstacles, and although breakups and separations will be painful for this duo, a love affair here will be truly unforgettable.

Marriages can be as promising as love affairs. These two will enjoy establishing a home together, decorating it somewhat unusually and making it a stylish and comfortable place in which to live. Both partners have refined tastes, making them likely to have friends who are educated and interesting, but alas not necessarily the most real or human in expressing their feelings. The children of such a marriage may feel as if they're walking on eggs most of the time to keep up appearances; they will never, for example, be allowed to mess up the neatness of the home. Accordingly they may become inhibited and frustrated if forbidden to express their own individuality. Friendships or working relationships between these two can be difficult, particularly if Virgo-Libras become obsessive about their partner. Aries-Taurus don't like their friends to be clinging, and are uncomfortable when they feel that their relationships are ruled by the manipulative emotions of others, preferring more relaxed and easy comrades. If these partners are only acquaintances, or companions engaged in a common aesthetic pursuit, things could work out better for them.

A Need for Structure

The question here is whether enough stability can be established to hold the relationship together. The combination's underlying theme is dominance, but the nature of its participants is such that they won't be able to dominate an area, subject, or group together; a structure must be created whereby they both have their own, separate sphere of influence. If this structure is already in place, so much the better. If not, whether or not it can be achieved will determine whether peace or chaos will prevail.

Although Libra I's and Aries-Taurus seem well suited in many respects, the chemistry of their matchup is unstable, and they can drive each other crazy in a day-to-day living situation. Aries-Taurus will admire Libra I technical skill and perfectionism, while Libra I's will value the Aries-Taurus habit of painstaking preparation and execution. The indecisiveness of Libra I's, however, will eventually push even the most patient Aries-Taurus to the brink.

If the heavy demands made by the Libra I personality are revealed to Aries-Taurus during a love affair, they may feel compelled to leave—unless, that is, their sexual involvement with the intense Libra I has assumed addictive proportions. Should they fail to discover the difficult side of Libra I until after they marry, however, they are faithful and stubborn enough to hang in there until the bitter end. Marriages between these two are unlikely to be easy, for perfectionistic Libra I's tend to be nit-pickers and Aries-Taurus need to be left alone. The Aries-Taurus insistence on emotional honesty will force Libra I's to express their real feelings, no matter how negative or destructive. This is exactly what Libra I's need to do, and a strong Aries-Taurus personality may well deepen and prolong a friendship or love affair with a Libra I by such confrontations.

Libra I's have a wild and wacky side that can lead to fun times in this relationship, whether it is a sibling or co-worker matchup or a friendship. Their sense of humor will be appreciated by Aries-Taurus, whose heavier moods will be lightened by a Libra I presence.

ADVICE: Clearing the air may be the first step to understanding. Be open and honest. Bring more structure to your life. Lessen chaotic elements.

THE WEEK OF SOCIETY
LIBRA II

Congenial Persuasion

Interestingly, this relationship is primarily oriented toward persuading others, preferably a broader audience or society. Feelings run strong here, particularly with regard to whatever it is that this couple wants others to feel, think, understand or do. This is often quite an unconscious part of the pairing, which may be quite low-key in its overall intentions. Beware, however, should these partners become enemies, when all their combined persuasive power will be directed toward condemning each other.

In friendship, love or marriage, the relationship may be quite relaxed and accepting. Libra II's have the right mixture of peacefulness, charm and kookiness to interest an Aries-Taurus and assure his or her continued interest, and they in turn will benefit from being able to depend on a solid Aries-Taurus partner. Overdependence may become a problem here: Libra II's may be too self-sacrificing, and may suffer a loss of self-esteem, if they get too devoted to their Aries-Taurus mate, lover or friend.

Love may blossom between Aries-Tauruses and Libra II's after an introductory friendship. Both of them care about harmony and beauty, creating a synergy that will enhance each one's appreciation of art, music, literature, design, gardening and a host of aesthetic activities. Deciding to live together as lovers, they may feel no need to give their relationship the more solid stamp of marriage. But if they do marry, or even if they remain a long-standing couple, they will have a talent for dealing with people and social situations. They should take care, however, to take the time they need to be alone, and to limit the social element. Aries-Taurus-Libra II family relations can be characterized by good feeling and mutual understanding. As co-workers, these two may wind up enjoying each other so much that they forget about getting the job done. Although this scenario is somewhat extreme, since both are usually quite professional, their mutual appreciation of each other can lead to a loss of edge; this relationship is not the most hard-driving or self-sacrificing imaginable. Its energy, then, is better suited to easy partnerships than to highly ambitious or competitive ones.

ADVICE: Harmony has its dangers too. Be a bit more ambitious. Think about who you are persuading, and why. Reflect on the nature of manipulation.

THE WEEK OF THEATER
LIBRA III

Few Demands

The success of this relationship depends on how it handles problems of dominance and subtle forms of manipulation. In fact, its attitudes may be much too inflexible and controlling to allow those who share it to live together in peace.

Despite strong initial attractions and mutually sensuous orientations, love affairs between these two are unlikely to reach the stratosphere. Actually, matters of the heart between these two are more likely to wind up where they should have started in the first place—as easygoing friendships, with few demands on either partner. Marriages too are unlikely to be very successful, particularly if they involve children or other relatives. Libra III's generally find it hard to give themselves to people in a family setting, preferring to save their energies for other areas, like career, social activities or favorite hobby or sport. Aries-Tauruses usually want to participate in the many aspects of family life when married, and this difference may cause irreconcilable problems.

The relationship can, however, be highly successful as a friendship. Both parties demand strength in their deepest friendships, and this one can be outstanding in promoting talent, ability and depth of commitment to life and work. Each partner will learn a great deal from this relationship, which also has much to teach to others. Shared evenings, occasional vacations and participation in cultural happenings are all possible here.

Aries-Tauruses are likely to make devoted parents of Libra III children, but will often understand them less and less as the years go by—a pity, since it is in adult life that Libra III's may be most needy of their parents. Libra III's will rarely make good parents for Aries-Tauruses, and as co-workers are often demanding and critical of them. In the workplace, in fact, the tensions in the relationship are counterproductive to achieving success. Aries-Tauruses like straightforwardness but also demand flexibility and compromise, which are anathema to Libra III's.

ADVICE: Let things be. Back off. Allow events to unfold without influencing them. Have faith. Compromise is essential. Get priorities straight.

THE CUSP OF DRAMA & CRITICISM

Oscillating Behavior

Opposites attract, and these two types, directly opposing each other in the zodiac, are indeed in many ways complementary. Aries-Taurus is a fire-earth combination, denoting an intuitive and sensuous type, and Libra-Scorpio an air-water coupling, indicating a yoking of thought and feeling. Between these two, then, they create the whole earth-air-fire-water spectrum, making this a strong combination for friendship and, possibly, love. Yet the synergy of the relationship, and the astrological opposition, also point to wide swings of feeling and behavior, so that the combination's hallmarks are instability, change, flux and oscillation. Ideally, challenges and goals need to be created for the relationship so that, rather than swinging to and fro, it can move forward.

Love affairs between these two can be quite spectacular when on and nothing short of disastrous when off. Libra-Scorpios are extremely charismatic types, and Aries-Tauruses smitten by their charms will be difficult to deter. Problems usually arise less at this stage, however, than after the goal, whether it be romantic or sexual, has been achieved. Libra-Scorpios can be a real handful emotionally, especially in this relationship, which brings out their dramatic and petulant side. In the sexual sphere, Libra-Scorpios tend to be more passionate than sensuous, while Aries-Tauruses are decidedly sensuous in all areas of life. Thus Aries-Tauruses may be upset by the relationship's coolness, while the Libra-Scorpios may miss a cataclysmic and intense sexual quality that they crave.

In friendships, familial and work situations, the relationship is complementary, but mutual willfulness and strong-mindedness will create problems in a daily setting. As parents and bosses, however, Aries-Tauruses will be strong enough to keep the energies of Libra-Scorpios on track, preventing their erratic side from getting out of control.

ADVICE: Iron out mood swings. Appreciate the value of moderation. Try to be more consistent. Tend to practical matters. Work on challenges.

Testing the Mettle

Issues of authority will be at the forefront in this relationship, in terms less of directing others (though this is part of the issue) than of inner resources and private goals. Poking deep into the relationship, one would expect to find an underlying insecurity linking this pair together. They will put a great deal of emphasis on helping each other achieve their main desire: upward mobility. The success of this endeavor will be the test of the relationship's mettle.

These two are often drawn to each other physically, and a desire-filled love affair may result. Scorpio I's can be difficult lovers for Aries-Tauruses, however, despite their ardor and passion, since they are extremely critical and exacting. They can also be quite cruel in extracting retribution when they feel rejected, and after a few bouts of what Aries-Tauruses may view as sadistic behavior on their partner's part, they may decide to call it quits.

Marriages here are not particularly advised, unless they are engaged upon purely for social aims. Even then, both partners must be ready to endure some wearing and painfully drawn-out episodes.

In friendships in this combination, the authority of each party must be equal. Status and power play a role in this relationship, and Scorpio I's in particular can feel resentful if a friend moves in more elevated social circles. This will also undercut their self-assurance. Conflicts may arise if high-placed Aries-Tauruses treat Scorpio I friends in what seems to be a condescending manner.

In the family and at work, Scorpio I's can be quite unforgiving when they believe those around them are operating out of impure or questionable motives. To perform the right action is not enough if it is done for the wrong reason, and since Aries-Tauruses are pragmatic in outlook, they may be quite bewildered when their Scorpio I partner criticizes them on this front. In working relationships the ethical stance of a Scorpio I can be quite bothersome to an Aries-Taurus, who will see it as unproductive, undermining efficiency and the job at hand.

ADVICE: Beware of being snobbish. Cultivate kindness and consideration. Don't be cruel. Put away judgmental attitudes.

Brilliant Challenge

This combination can make for a highly unusual relationship, one of passion and brilliance. It will be most successful when the relationship's demands are not excessive and individual differences are respected. Freedom is a necessity here, yet given enough free rein, the relationship can endure, since neither party will ever find another partnership as powerful or unique. Both Aries-Taurus and Scorpio II are very powerful individuals, and a combination that outshines even them is quite a draw for them. In fact they may find themselves more attracted to the relationship than they are to each other.

A same-sex Aries-Taurus-Scorpio II friendship is often very comforting, and can also stimulate the careers of both partners. It will have a foundation of mutual respect, and each will generally admire the other party's achievement and power. Even more rewarding are this combination's love affairs, which can be deep, passionate and emotionally challenging for both partners. One issue between these two might be physical appearance: Aries-Taurus are sensitive to comments on this subject, and Scorpio II's can be highly critical about such matters. Moreover, Scorpio II's tend to be controlling in all aspects of their love relationships, and this can create great difficulties for their Aries-Taurus partners, who will not be subdued or dominated. Conversely, Aries-Taurus toughness may leave Scorpio II's feeling hurt or misunderstood. These relationships can be incredible experiences both emotionally and sexually, but the partners must be able to arrive at a point of mutual acceptance, openness and sharing.

Overly demanding Scorpio II parents will engender rebellion in their Aries-Taurus children. Work relationships in this combination can be either highly productive or highly destructive, depending on the duo's orientation: these two can build an effective day-to-day work schedule if they keep personal matters in abeyance, but Scorpio II's are very careful with money, and there will surely be conflict over Aries-Taurus' lavish tastes and free spending.

THE WEEK OF CHARM
SCORPIO III

A Need to Be Faithful

If the issues of authority and of the balance of power that are so deeply embedded in this relationship are to be dealt with successfully, a concentration on developing faithfulness, trust and honesty will have to emerge. Both partners must feel free to speak their minds. Since both Aries-Taurus and Scorpio III are weighty individuals who are quite serious in outlook, the relationship's tendency to keep its partners upbeat and looking on the positive side is a definite plus.

Both Aries-Taurus and Scorpio III like people who have the inner resources to pull their own weight and pay their own way. When these two are companions and acquaintances, this mutual preference will manifest as the partners' healthy respect for each other in down-to-earth, everyday matters.

A love relationship here can be both attractive and quite romantic. But no matter how strong the sexual chemistry may be, deep involvement will not develop unless there is a solid bond of trust. Repressed storms of passion often rage within Scorpio III's, forcing their partner either to react with similar emotions or perhaps to turn off completely. Fortunately, Aries-Taurus have a patient and understanding side, but they will still be troubled by the Scorpio III tendency toward possessiveness and jealousy. Such tendencies may have to be mastered or given up if the relationship is to move on to marriage or a more permanent living arrangement.

Whether or not these two can be friends depends on the Scorpio III's willingness and ability to open up to the Aries-Taurus in the personal sphere. This may be difficult if they find the Aries-Taurus too imposing, or if their feelings of inferiority are aroused. Scorpio III's have a strong need to be honest with another human being at a deep level, however, and if they can show their weaknesses and doubts to an Aries-Taurus (often a very understanding observer and listener) without feeling threatened, they may receive invaluable advice and guidance. Family members and co-workers in this combination may mutually distrust each other and never get very close. Despite their respect for each other, emotional honesty will be difficult between them.

ADVICE: Admitting weakness can be a sign of strength. Accept honest attitudes. Cultivate faithfulness. Make it harder to push your buttons.

Mutual Respect

This relationship can be a paradigm for easy and accepting attitudes. Aries-Taurus-Scorpio-Sagittarius is among the few combinations in the year where the partners can be both friends and lovers before, during and after their love affair. There is a deep understanding and loyalty in this relationship, and a mutual respect, especially on the mental plane. Yet as well as these two get along, it may not be in the cards for them to marry or even live together, since ease does not necessarily entail either emotional depth or the ability to commit.

Even if these two meet when either or both of them is involved with another steady partner or spouse, the seductive pull of a love affair between them will usually be so great that neither can resist. The results might be tragic, particularly for the third parties, but the maturity and control of which the Aries-Taurus-Scorpio-Sagittarius relationship is capable will have a strong tempering effect. So unshakable is the relationship's faith in itself, in fact, that it can show consideration for the feelings of others to a most unusual degree.

These two do not necessarily make a strong parent-child combination, principally because of the Scorpio-Sagittarians, who, as parents, can often be impatient with having children around and, as children, will probably be rebellious towards an overbearing or overprotective Aries-Taurus parent. A sibling relationship, however, particularly between opposite sexes, may be extremely close and affectionate, both in childhood and into more mature years.

In business, Scorpio-Sagittarians can exceed even Aries-Tauruses in their lavish tastes, so that this combination could eat up its profits. As co-workers they will get along well enough, but neither may be enthusiastic enough to put out their very best, either individually or together, within a company structure. Their optimal working combination may be as freelancers, consultants or advisors, a context that could free them to decide their courses of action and their work methods independently of each other, while at the same time being able to complement each other whenever there is mutual advantage in doing so.

ADVICE: Have fun but stay respectful of others. Control selfish desires. Beware of elitist attitudes. Push yourself a bit more to scale the heights.

Cross Rhythms

The key to this relationship's success will be the ability to create balance and provide leadership and guidance in any project. An immediate problem is that of synchronization, for these two partners' rhythms may not gel with each other. Differences in style and tempo are substantial here: Aries-Tauruses are consolidators of energy and masters of the slow buildup, Sagittarius I's are more apt to explode in a fast break. Moreover, the internal motor of Sagittarius I's usually runs at a higher rate than that of Aries-Tauruses, who may still be warming up when the Sagittarius I is long gone.

Such differences in tempo may create difficulties in the emotional and sexual aspects of love relationships, but Sagittarius I intensity is usually sufficient to satisfy the most demanding of Aries-Tauruses. Highly charged emotional relationships can emerge between these two if one of them is already committed to a partner, creating a love triangle. Should all three be able to be friends, a positive outcome may be expected, but if either the Sagittarius I or the Aries-Taurus views the third person with hostility, a volatile situation is likely to arise.

In marriages and in business or other career settings, Sagittarius I's strongly benefit from having a stable, dependable partner who can hang back and be there for them without question. Aries-Tauruses may fit the bill perfectly. To have such a partner as advisor, manager, planner or director of their energies will be invaluable to Sagittarius I's, and to any team of which these two are a part. Executive qualities are highly effective here. For the same reasons, Aries-Tauruses can make understanding parents for Sagittarius I children—and also understanding children for Sagittarius I parents. Again, this duo will have a leadership role in the family. And should Aries-Taurus and Sagittarius I lovers decide to marry, they may be among the most nurturing combinations of the whole year, providing warmth, direction, safety and attention to their children. On the other hand, Aries-Tauruses and Sagittarius I's do not always make the best friends. Both of them are opinionated and strong-minded, and emotionally they may not always be on the same wavelength.

ADVICE: Develop sensitivity to rhythms different from your own. Try to harness and coordinate energies. Seek effective leadership. Divide tasks fairly.

Prepare to Compromise

Unless this relationship concerns itself primarily with the ability to accept, forgive and forget, the irritations and disapproving attitudes inherent here are likely to lead to difficulty, possibly even rejection or separation. Luckily this combination has a conscience, so that when infringements occur, awareness is not far behind. Matters will quickly be set right, allowing the relationship to move forward again.

Sagittarius II's have an unpredictable and impulsive nature that will often drive more responsible Aries-Taurus parents, bosses or mates to distraction. Typically sensitive, they will probably worry and wonder whether the Aries-Taurus accepts their more peculiar qualities. No matter how great the attraction between these two, a love affair between them is unlikely to last long; Aries-Tauruses will be worn down by its instabilities and petty conflicts. In certain rare cases, however, these partners may be able to focus on the relationship's more positive aspects, resulting in a more stable relationship (though never completely so). Marriages here can be highly problematic, and are not recommended unless the Sagittarius II is prepared to compromise and to tone down his or her personality, and the Aries-Taurus to be even more patient and accepting than usual.

At work, Sagittarius II's do best in occupations that allow them to express their unusual side, and Aries-Tauruses—generally pragmatic types who want the maximum progress for the minimum trouble—are unlikely to show a great deal of sympathy for such idiosyncratic behavior on the job. But friendships between these two can be very rewarding, the Sagittarius II contributing interest and excitement, the Aries-Taurus loyalty and reliability. As long as the pairing does not demand in-depth involvement in personal matters, it can prove highly satisfactory for companionship or social partnership. One danger may be, however, that Sagittarius II's can cast Aries-Tauruses in a parental role, projecting on them certain feelings from childhood.

An Aries-Taurus brother or sister—particularly an older one, perhaps one of the few constants in a Sagittarius II's childhood or adolescence—can provide a good grounding for Sagittarius II energy.

ADVICE: Discuss differences openly. Work on compromise and acceptance. Don't give in to negativity or hopelessness. See things in a positive light.

Need to Be Boss

The question of leadership will be a sore spot in this pairing, which is likely to focus on conflicts over dominance. Furthermore, the relationship's underlying modus operandi is likely to involve each partner ripping open and exposing the other's weaknesses or dark side. This of course achieves nothing, and weakens the overall fabric of the relationship. The Aries-Taurus-Sagittarius III combination, then, is unlikely to be a good one for business or marital partnerships. Both personalities have a need to be the boss, and neither will give ground easily. Should these two head rival commercial, social or even family groups, they are likely to be formidable adversaries.

In love relationships the problem of dominance will also rear its ugly head. Sagittarius III's need to be adored, admired and praised, and Aries-Tauruses are not so easily impressed. Also, when another person gains at what they feel is their expense, Aries-Tauruses are likely to lose interest or back off. There may be a certain sexual intensity here, but it is likely to be an expression more of ego than of love, and to be motivated more by challenge than by desire. Sagittarius III's can have difficulty satisfying Aries-Tauruses' sensual side, and giving enough emotionally to their demanding partners.

At work, Sagittarius III's think big and are risk-takers who attempt the impossible, or at least the very difficult, while Aries-Tauruses tend to be skeptical, and are suspicious of grandiose schemes. Friendships can work better, featuring lively and thought-provoking philosophical discussions. And as companions in travel and challenging physical activities, Sagittarius III's can bring out Aries-Tauruses' more adventuresome side, although such a relationship may never manifest emotional closeness.

Aries-Taurus parents will do their best to instill a note of realism in what they may view as the idle views and runaway fantasies of their Sagittarius III offspring. On the other hand, an Aries-Taurus child may suffer disillusionment on seeing the puncturing of a Sagittarius III parent's perhaps inspired, perhaps inflated schemes.

ADVICE: Try to give more emotionally. Tone down combative attitudes. Competition can be productive as long as it doesn't get out of hand.

Silent Storms

Sensitivities run high in this relationship, which will involve a tendency to hide irritations and true feelings only to reveal them periodically in startling fashion. For good and bad, the relationship is characterized by strong emotions. This is partly because the combination's energy rarely focuses on the mundane, practical aspects of life. It is either directed completely outside the relationship (at the world at large) or at the relationship itself, which will inevitably begin to crack under the strain.

Aries-Taurus will be disturbed by the relationship's silences and suppressive aspects, for they like up-front attitudes about thoughts and feelings. Sagittarius-Capricorns tend to hide their true personalities, and Aries-Taurus may see this as sneaky and manipulative, particularly when the two are of the same sex. Positive relations between these two, then, are usually unlikely or impossible; an adversarial role is much more common.

As far as love is concerned, deep sympathy or compassion is unlikely to appear here, yet there is often an attraction. Sexual relations of a passionate but often unfeeling nature may result, but unless variations or deviations are introduced, the relationship is likely to burn out fast. Often, however, the powerful sexuality of each of these partners is never called into play in the first place, for both of them think better than to get involved.

Marriages and business relations between these two are unlikely. Although Aries-Taurus and Sagittarius-Capricorn have qualities in common (they are both fire-earth combinations), they intuitively understand that involvement in any permanent situation could invite disaster. Aries-Taurus will find Sagittarius-Capricorn's lack of business sense appalling, and Sagittarius-Capricorn may see Aries-Taurus as cruel or unfeeling tyrants.

As family members, Sagittarius-Capricorn may look up to or admire an Aries-Taurus, but more often as a grandparent, aunt or uncle than as a parent. Likewise an Aries-Taurus child may find a Sagittarius-Capricorn intriguing and fascinating, and seek them out for advice, but also to learn about their experiences. Family relationships not of the parent-child variety are likely to be most productive and fulfilling.

ADVICE: What is hidden is sometimes best left that way. Don't stir up trouble. Be honest, up to a point, and mind your manners. Be sympathetic.

Breathing New Life

This relationship embraces correction and enhancement. It will be very involved in locating and revealing problems and weaknesses, enabling their repair. Making an object, person or system operate smoothly, healthily or efficiently is the ultimate goal. Should Aries-Taurus and Capricorn I share similar outlooks on how a company, club or family should run, they can make successful business or marital partners. The relationship will usually adopt a moderate or conservative stance, belying certain progressive or even radical tendencies on the part of these two personalities. It can be good with money—Aries-Taurus with making and spending it, Capricorn I with managing it. Although both of these partners are dominant types, power struggles are unlikely to arise often in their relationship, which will feature mutual respect and a realization that such struggles would be damaging to the group of which they are a part.

In love and family relationships, Aries-Taurus will cry out for Capricorn I's to express their true and deeper feelings, and to show more sympathy and understanding. Conflicts may only be deepened if Aries-Taurus grow frustrated with Capricorn I's and withdraw, or lash out periodically in anger. Small daily tensions, seemingly insignificant, can be blown out of all proportion, creating an unstable and counterproductive atmosphere. Generally speaking, enthusiastic romantic feelings will be difficult for these two to sustain, often being replaced by a more pragmatic attitude, particularly in sexual matters; it will be vital, then, for the relationship to renew itself periodically. As parents, both Capricorn I's and Aries-Taurus will address the problems and provide the structure and support their children need, but their offspring do not always appreciate them, at times viewing their parents as tinkering with them. Friendships can succeed only if the relationship's high standards of approval are met. The partners must prove interesting to each other and continue to have something to offer each other. Bonds of friendship, painstakingly built, can be severely tested or broken by competition or jealousy. The loss of the friendship may prove demoralizing to either or both parties.

ADVICE: A weakness for money does not imply power. Breathe new life into your activities. A sharp knife cuts better. Get in touch with your deeper feelings.

A Higher Plane

This relationship will be drawn over and over to matters of spirit, religion or philosophy. Materialistic or pragmatic concerns are not of primary importance here. True, Aries-Taurus-Capricorn II friendships have a practical, down-to-earth streak, especially in everyday matters; but beyond this their relationship will often evince a deep interest in aesthetics and philosophy, adding a whole new dimension to its partners' pragmatic natures. The relationship is characterized by an emotional warmth that is highly satisfying. Discussions of highly personal subjects generally stay objective, without the intrusion of undue emotion. The friendship makes space for vacations and other trips together, and financial responsibility is rarely an issue here.

Love and marriage will demand care, for Capricorn II's need to keep their private and career lives strictly separate. Aries-Tauruses are usually strong enough not to be overly demanding of their attention, and the relationship tends to feature a highly independent outlook in both career and social matters. But Aries-Tauruses generally need a lot more steady affection than Capricorn II's do, and although Capricorn II's can be sexually powerful, they are not known for exhibiting the day-to-day tenderness and sympathy that Aries-Tauruses require if they are to be happy and satisfied. Should power struggles arise, attitudes may become hurtful and unforgiving, yet a wise and realistic attitude will often prevail, allowing needs to be realized and resentments forgotten.

When these two are co-workers or business associates, Capricorn II ambition can prove a problem: in crucial situations, Aries-Tauruses may be suspicious of their partner's motives, particularly if they feel that the Capricorn II is putting his or her own interests ahead of the group's. Capricorn II's also have a workaholic side, whereas Aries-Tauruses need time off and would often prefer not to be working at all. Thus Capricorn II's may come to resent the fact that Aries-Tauruses are contributing less energy and commitment than they are.

ADVICE: If you feel resentment you have a responsibility to express it. Tenderness is key to happiness. Emphasize the positive by embarking on a course of study together.

Inscrutable Byways

This combination will tend to reveal its partners' hidden insecurities, making the relationship itself feel unstable. It often involves unfavorable comparisons, real or imagined; there will be a tendency to over-achieve and overreach in an attempt to assert capability and expertise. Trying too hard, and displaying jealousy, only reveal the depth of such insecurities. The combination of admiration and jealousy can be both inspiring and inhibiting. The relationship, then, is likely to have elements of secrecy, enigma and complexity.

Capricorn III's may have a secret inferiority complex that a relationship with an Aries-Taurus can bring out. The relationship can also reveal Aries-Taurus insecurities. Both Aries-Tauruses and Capricorn III's need to dominate at home, and the house big enough to hold both of them, as spouses or live-in lovers, may not have been built yet. Children and others who live with them may witness power struggles of gigantic proportions, which can threaten to tear the family apart. In the worst-case scenario, the children are forced to take sides or, in a divorce struggle, are played off against the other parent. Should common sense prevail early on in a marriage, however, these spouses may be able to come to a common agreement about who rules what, avoiding conflict for all concerned. Their ability to agree on material possessions will be especially important.

As lovers, Aries-Tauruses and Capricorn III's may have a deeply sensual bond. The pleasures of table and bed attract both of them strongly, and should they find each other agreeable and desirable, their love affair may go on for some time. Such a love affair can be both preceded and followed by friendship. Should an Aries-Taurus-Capricorn III love affair end by mutual consent, without to-do or negativity, they may quite naturally want to continue seeing each other as friends, or to share a common activity from time to time.

This relationship is naturally work oriented, but the work arena, more than any other, is likely to cause tension and insecurity. Since both Aries-Tauruses and Capricorn III's need to dominate, they are probably best off not working together. If given no choice, they should structure clear and separate lines of responsibility.

ADVICE: Beware of involving others in your power struggles. Diminish ego involvement. Avoid comparison. Be secure in who you are.

Tidal Wave

Although Aries-Taurus and Capricorn-Aquarius are, respectively, fire-earth and earth-air combinations, the focus of their relationship will be in the area of the missing element, water, which symbolizes feelings. This is a highly emotional combination, one that can easily create an extremely private, isolated domain. These partners build walls of feeling that can threaten to overwhelm them. Only the hardest of souls would venture to choose this hermetic, emotionally dangerous combination.

Aries-Tauruses may initially find Capricorn-Aquariuses unsettling, fascinating and attractive. Should they get involved, they can expect high passion and desire but also outbursts of anger and even violence. In love relationships, the relationship's synergy brings out its partners' best and their worst, since both know how to hit the raw nerves of the other's sensitivities. Such love affairs rarely develop into marriage or living together; although Aries-Tauruses have the kind of personality that will lend a measure of stability to the relationship, its emotional storms will make it impossible for them to control their own feelings to the necessary degree, and personal power and mastery are paramount for them.

Growing up in a family setting, Aries-Taurus and Capricorn-Aquarius siblings may fight constantly, particularly if they are of the same sex. Over the years, however, they may develop a close and mutually supportive bond, often starting to relate better to each other in early adulthood.

The relationship can work out well in the work sphere, as long as everyone sticks to the job at hand and resists getting sidetracked by personal differences and irritations. Aries-Tauruses will find Capricorn-Aquarian energies chaotic from time to time but will recognize that these personalities are hard workers as long as they know what is expected of them. Often an Aries-Taurus co-worker may exert a stabilizing force on Capricorn-Aquariuses, giving them the support and understanding they need if they are to continue in the team.

ADVICE: Chaos is often something we attract rather than run into by chance. Understand your emotions better. Keep cool. Learn patience.

Give and Take

This relationship has the potential to be satisfying and thoughtful, with an even-keeled level of feeling and a direct yet measured kind of communication. The relationship is inherently about boundaries—creating them and staying within them, to keep things functioning smoothly.

Aries-Tauruses and Aquarius I's are compatible in love affairs, partly because neither of them enjoys complex emotional interactions. Young Aries-Tauruses may be fascinated with the precocious energies of Aquarius I's, but when more mature they will have problems with the Aquarius I habit of practicing a double standard. Aquarius I's may lean heavily on Aries-Tauruses for support, gaining a measure of stability from their confidence and reliability. Should Aquarius I choose to roam, however, while expecting their partner to be faithful, an Aries-Taurus is likely either to lose interest or quietly to crack the whip.

Marriages in this combination can be successful and long lasting provided Aquarius I's pull their own weight and devote the necessary time and energy to family tasks, particularly those involving children. Although they give the impression of being free spirits who can and will not be tied down, Aquarius I's may need the stability of family if they are truly to blossom, and Aries-Taurus may be the perfect mate—appreciative, affectionate and, above all, able to get them moving. The chemistry here works both ways, for Aquarius I's will also get Aries-Tauruses out of the house more often, encourage them in their activities. Each can provide a kind of structure for the other. This combination is not particularly recommended for co-workers, associates or business partners, since Aries-Tauruses are likely to grow impatient with what they view as Aquarius I shortsightedness and impracticality. As family members, they may also grow dissatisfied and frustrated with having to clean up after Aquarius I siblings or children off having a good time. But Aries-Tauruses' condemnatory and judgmental attitudes to what they view as Aquarius I irresponsibility can in turn irritate and arouse the rebelliousness of Aquarius I family members.

ADVICE: Follow the golden rule. Give and take equally. Service is one of the highest ends. Be sure your needs are satisfied.

Down in the Sandbox

This relationship focuses on creating the openness to follow imaginative impulses—or, more specifically, on fantasy and play. This freedom of enjoyment requires work, of course, primarily in finding the balance between conflicting points of view and energies, particularly in daily activities. Still, the relationship can be so playful that the partners will hardly know the work is being done. Aquarius II's tend to bring out the lighter side of Aries-Taurus, who are serious and powerful people but also like to have fun. Generally speaking, the relationship will not go terribly deep, nor does it have to—as friends, these two will often find themselves having a good time.

In marriages and career partnerships, this can be an excellent pair. Aries-Taurus will admire the accomplishments and talents of Aquarius II's; they themselves have to work much harder for what they get, but they are not jealous of people who can achieve a lot without undue effort. In marriages, however, problems may arise when things are going badly for Aquarius II's, who are prone to depression. Wrestling with their dark side is not easy either for them or for those they live with, and Aries-Taurus patience, particularly concerning infidelity, may be severely tried.

Aries-Taurus parents will be extremely proud of their Aquarius II children, even to the point of doting on them, yet they may be ineffective in teaching them sound and reasonable life principles. Aquarius II parents have a great deal to teach their Aries-Taurus children about sophisticated approaches to many areas of life, and will know how to keep the youthfulness they will need in this relationship: from time to time, it will be necessary for them to get down in the sandbox with these children. Love affairs of this combination are likely to be evanescent and unstable, on again and off again. Permanence and tradition are not usually in the cards for this relationship, no matter how attractive it may be to either or both parties at any one moment.

ADVICE: Adults need play too. Find a balance between work and leisure. Everything is relative. Don't forget to attend to the practicalities.

House on Fire

Physical and sensuous, this relationship often also features an interest in current events and social doings. Romantically and sexually it can blaze like a house on fire, at least for a while; in fact, romance and a dreamlike quality give it a soft glow. There is a significant danger, however, that these partners will get caught up in seeking a perfect vision of a relationship rather than dealing with the realities of one.

Aries-Taurus are fascinated by the colorful personalities of Aquarius III's, whom they may find romantically irresistible. Aquarius III's for their part can find the Aries-Taurus brand of sexuality extremely rich and rewarding. A problem in long-term relationships here is that the Aquarius III need for attention and affection is monumental. Since Aries-Taurus usually have other things to do, they may find these demands tiring or wearing, particularly after a hard day's work. Marriages or permanent living situations, then, are often not meant to be.

One problem that these two run into as friends, mates and living partners is that Aquarius III's will tend to accuse Aries-Taurus of things of which they themselves are guilty. Projection is a key word here. A lot of the time, Aquarius III's are exciting, bubbly and happy personalities, but when an Aries-Taurus sees the haze of unreality behind these positive attitudes, trouble is probably not far off. Masters of reality, Aries-Taurus will probably be judgmental and critical of the optimism of Aquarius III's, who may feel that a damper is always being thrown over their enthusiasm. The resulting dark moods, anger and outbursts of Aquarius III's shadow side may fuel the fire.

Aries-Taurus parents have a great deal to teach their Aquarius III offspring but will generally find these children hard or impossible to control. (The children, in turn, often have trouble pleasing their Aries-Taurus parents, who seem to know better about almost everything.) Likewise, Aries-Taurus bosses and business partners may find irrepressible Aquarius III's difficult to manage or work with because of their insistence on doing things in their own highly individual and often peculiar way.

ADVICE: Face yourself squarely in the mirror. Beware of illusions. Try to be more tolerant. Learn to compromise a bit. Try to limit dependency.

Nurturing Activities

This rather elemental combination is best accepted for what it is rather than analyzed for what it is not. At its best, it can symbolize the core aspect of creation—giving birth to the new and wholly unique. In fact, bringing new life into the world can stand as a symbol of this relationship. Marriages between these two are apt to include an urge to have children or, failing that, another kind of creative endeavor. Aquarius-Pisces will benefit from the stability and practicality that an Aries-Taurus mate has to offer, and Aries-Taurus will find Aquarius-Pisces caring spouses. The more lonely or withdrawn type of Aquarius-Pisces personality may well bloom in a family setting that includes an Aries-Taurus. Nurturing activities, including sharing the responsibility of children (not necessarily their own), pets and a garden, are particularly suited to this relationship.

In love affairs, Aquarius-Pisces may lack the sexual intensity or romantic flair to keep their Aries-Taurus partners interested for long. Platonic friendships are more likely, since kindness and understanding are often more important to Aquarius-Pisces than physical contact is. This kind of relationship will allow Aries-Taurus to express the more sympathetic elements of their personality, and their combative stance may soften when they have a nonthreatening partner.

Aquarius-Pisces have a chip-on-the-shoulder attitude that can well emerge around more threatening Aries-Taurus personalities, particularly colleagues or family members. But they can be aggressive themselves, as well as ambitious, and if they find themselves in direct competition with an Aries-Taurus they may become increasingly insecure. Except in directly confrontational situations, such as business, career or sibling rivalries, Aries-Taurus may be baffled or bewildered by Aquarius-Pisces reactions, and with all best intentions will seek to make them less upset and more comfortable. As children, sensitive Aquarius-Pisces may feel misunderstood by an Aries-Taurus parent, and will seek to protect themselves by building a wall against what they perceive as criticism or aggression. Aries-Taurus children are likely to find Aquarius-Pisces parents caring and responsive.

ADVICE: It's never too late for forgiveness and understanding. Don't be obsessed with your own problems. Brighten up. Listen to criticism.

Sounding Board

This relationship is apt to focus on what its partners consider the finer things. Refined, aesthetic, perhaps even worldly in its energies, the combination loves beauty in any form, and beauty will bring these two together. A certain objective awareness and detachment, inherent here and necessary for the evaluation of any art form, precludes the formation of a deeper attachment.

Although psychological opposites in many respects, Aries-Taurus and Pisces I's may like each other and enjoy spending time together, particularly when sharing joint interests. The emotional subtlety and deviousness of the Pisces I personality is likely to escape the more direct Aries-Taurus, who will soon tire of putting energy into being understanding of and catering to Pisces I feelings. Aries-Taurus run the risk of being rejected by Pisces I's for being controlling, judgmental and mercenary. Love relationships and marriages between these two are generally ill-fated.

Friendships, on the other hand, can click. The pair will be understanding and sympathetic, particularly when Aries-Taurus need to let off steam about whatever is bothering them at work and in their personal lives. The matchup can also provide ego support for Pisces I's by encouraging them to go for it and make the most of their talents. Pisces I's need a tremendous amount of acknowledgment, and this relationship can offer them an appreciative and enthusiastic sounding board, as well as a gratifying way for them to share their appreciation of art and music. The combination can also bring out its partners' physical side, encouraging them in activities ranging from long walks to one-on-one competitive sports. It does not recommend itself to business or other working relationships, however: Aries-Taurus will have little time to satisfy Pisces I's emotional needs or to be attentive to their sensitivity in the heat of a project or negotiation.

As siblings these two can make a good pair, forming a highly synergistic unit—one more whole and integrated than either of the individuals who together make it up.

ADVICE: Cultivate your love of beauty. Keep controlling tendencies in hand. Loosen perfectionistic attitudes. Work on intimacy.

A Threat to Peace and Quiet

Something about this relationship reminds one of the school yard. Its theme is a kind of tentative yet enthusiastic self-exploration, with sudden bouts of stubbornness and stormy altercations blowing over quickly against the backdrop of a welter of social activity. In short, this is a rather noisy, raucous kind of relationship, one that's unlikely to suit either of its partners for long.

The combination is unlikely to manifest as a passionate love affair. Pisces II's crave an unusual approach to love, often with an exotic or mysterious partner—a bill that solid Aries-Tauruses are unlikely to fit. Romantic, sensitive, poetic and creative, Pisces II's often get turned off by the direct Aries-Taurus approach, and must be wooed by subtler means. Both Aries-Tauruses and Pisces II's like a relationship to be less noisy, less busy, than this one. Marriages too are unusual, since the two great themes of marriage are social interaction and children, and Aries-Tauruses will rarely get either from a Pisces II spouse, who will probably prefer to lead a calm, isolated existence with few intrusions, even from children. And if marriage to a Pisces II means giving up on having children, an Aries-Taurus may back off. There are Pisces II's, however, who will want to take on the responsibility of a large family, and in such cases the relationship may succeed.

Parent-child relationships between these two are often close, and involve a steady interchange of affection and sympathy. Aries-Taurus parents will be attentive to the needs of Pisces II children, and Pisces II parents will be supportive and nurturing of Aries-Taurus children. But Pisces II's are likely to find an Aries-Taurus brother or sister aggressive, bossy and intolerant. These two are unlikely to work easily together in offices, work crews or business partnerships. Pisces II's resent power struggles, displays of ego and attempts to control, any of which may be exactly what this relationship is likely to serve up on their plate. Aries-Tauruses, on the other hand, may dislike a relationship in which they must accept a partner's easy attitudes and inability to stick to one line of thought, or to work solidly for long periods of time.

ADVICE: To love fully, you have to be allowed to discover your own feelings. Don't push. Back off and allow it to happen. Be open to wonder and to miracles.

Outshining Each Other

This combination focuses on who will be the star, since the chemistry here promotes feelings of omniscience, and a tendency to vie for the attention of friends and family. The relationship features public disagreements and displays of know-it-all attitude; friendships are unlikely to develop unless such attitudes can be dropped. It is possible, however, for these two to adopt a healthily competitive stance, both in daily life and on the playing field, which may spur them on to better their own personal best.

Aries-Taurus-Pisces III love affairs can be intense on the physical level, with both partners giving their all. All too often, however, these affairs will involve power struggles, with each person struggling to dominate the other. Both, but particularly Aries-Taurus, must learn to give up control, and to realize the superior quality and power of unselfish giving and love. This also holds true for parent-child and sibling relationships.

In marriage, Pisces III's are likely to drive a practical Aries-Taurus spouse crazy with their idealism and philosophical detachment. Aries-Tauruses will often want more attention to the here and now from Pisces III's, who are more interested in far-out schemes and thoughts, and delight in convoluted peregrinations of the mind that may be too much for even the most patient Aries-Taurus to bear.

These two may develop a sound relationship as co-workers, since Pisces III technical expertise blends well with Aries-Taurus driving force. If they can put their competitive need for attention aside, they can form a potent combination capable of scaling the heights. Business partnerships, however, are unlikely to be successful, since these partners are unlikely to agree on ideas, strategies and implementation in any marketing drive.

ADVICE: The will to overcome is best left at the bedroom door. Give love unconditionally. Allow for differences. Try to reach common ground.

A Comfortable Nest

The combination of two Taurus I's can be pictured as a secure and comfortable nest. It includes a love of repose in a home that is an inviolable haven of calm, far removed from the slings and arrows of everyday life. Taurus I lovers will have a sensuous life that is likely to be gratifying but predictable. The problem is that neither may be challenged enough by such a relationship to move forward in his or her personal development. A comfortable but stagnant situation may result. Should a more exciting or unstable third party come along, tempting one Taurus I to leave the other, both of them will inevitably suffer from guilt, remorse and repressed frustration. One of the greatest difficulties two Taurus I's face, whether in love or in marriage, is their inability to acknowledge a relationship's failure and to allow it to fall apart.

Taurus I friends generally form a tight bond, stressing fun through physical activities. If they grow up together they are likely to form an easy and rewarding relationship which will last them for life. Stubbornly tenacious and faithful (if sometimes more through an inability to admit failure than through true loyalty), the relationship is perhaps even better suited to career and family areas. Two Taurus I's, for example, would be good support for an aging parent or needy relative.

At work or at home, the relationship can form the bedrock of any group, lending it great stability. As parents, these two will have to beware of imposing too monolithic a set of rules or expectations on their children, making them either overly accepting or rebellious. The first of these is the more likely, a kind of tender-trap situation in which the children become too dependent on the parents and fail to develop independence and solid ego-formation. In business, this pair's strong, practical business acumen can produce success in any field. Mutually supportive, these partners usually understand each other well, and are particularly sympathetic when one of them feels let down or unappreciated by other people. They know how to share authority and delegate responsibility, skills necessary for any partnership to flourish.

ADVICE: Comfort and ease aren't always the most stimulating conditions for growth. Seek challenges. Let go of attachments. Dare to fail.

Deep Feelings

Although Taurus is an earth sign, orienting this personality toward the faculties of sensation and the material pleasures of life, the Taurus I–Taurus II relationship is highly charged. Any emotion that manifests will do so with intensity, so that upsets, hurt feelings and brooding are common. Together, these two are much concerned with the motives of others—they reinforce each other's ability to discover the truth, and the morality, in other people's actions. This is a duo that adopts a defensive posture against the rest of the world.

In living and work situations in this combination, emotional upsets will arise over what Taurus II's perceive as inflexibility or unfairness in Taurus I's. Taurus I's often picture themselves as being extremely, even overly fair and giving, a self-image that may impress Taurus II's as false and condescending. Feeling unappreciated and hurt by this judgment, Taurus I's may in turn withdraw their favors and retreat. This is a relationship in which suppressed feelings of frustration may one day build to a shattering climax.

Love affairs in this combination can prove quite passionate, in fact so passionate that their intensity of feeling will amount to a pressure against these two becoming life partners. Remaining uncommitted may also be preferable because the breakups or separations that are likely here will prove more painful when the couple are married, particularly in decisions over belongings, children and money. When difficulties arise in either love or marriage, Taurus II's are far more likely to see things realistically, albeit moralistically, and to insist on at least a trial separation, which Taurus I's may bitterly oppose. In friendships, the Taurus II's critical attitudes, and demands that the relationship move forward, are likely to disturb the Taurus I's enjoyment of things as they are. Relationships of this kind are unlikely to work out in the long run, despite many points of common interest and pleasure. As siblings, Taurus I's and II's are likely to clash in their stubbornness and their refusal to give ground. In parent-child relationships, either of these two is likely to supply the attention and reverence that will make them a good parent for the other.

ADVICE: Judgments can be as unfair as the actions or attitudes they condemn. Be more accepting. Try to be honest about yourself. Preserve freedom.

Delight and Teach

This combination's energies are often geared toward the enthusiastic sharing of new or innovative ideas or techniques. As a unit, these two can find themselves considered unconventional—their message will be unique to them. Individually, each has a very different approach from the other, but together they create something new and fresh, and they want nothing better than a willing audience to be taught it.

Taurus III's often have a hard time sticking to something—simply dropping whatever is too difficult or doesn't work is their usual way to proceed. Taurus I's, on the other hand, cannot rest unless their or other people's ideas are implemented efficiently. Furthermore, Taurus I's need fun only occasionally, and only so long as it doesn't conflict with their need to work and produce, while Taurus III's are up for good times and adventure at almost any moment. Taurus I's may come to view Taurus III's as superficial or lazy, then, but Taurus III's naturalistic approach can be the very setting needed for a creative spark to emerge. In that case, a Taurus I will be the ideal person to nurture that spark into a full-blown idea, and to develop it into something useful.

Understandably enough, developing and sharing a common outlook is as important in love affairs between these two as is avoiding the adoption of strict roles. Taurus III's often project childhood models—especially repressive ones, parental or otherwise—onto their partners and spouses, and Taurus I's may become objects of their aggression, hostility or rebellion. Things can be going along fine between these two when an inexplicable bout of arguments or conflicts suddenly bursts on the scene with frightening intensity. It may be hard for Taurus I's to show the flexibility and understanding that will allow Taurus III's to express their volatile emotions without hostility emerging, often on both sides. Taurus III's need not only freedom but security, however, and this relationship, particularly if it ventures into marriage, may be especially good at satisfying the latter need. With some effort and lessons learned, these two can create an unusual form of marriage, one that provides a stable and loving home environment and promotes understanding, sympathy and learning.

Stirring the Embers

This relationship is apt to stir up deep emotions, and magnetic attraction plays a strong role here. So strong is this attraction, in fact, that these two would be best off laying out some ground rules or a moral philosophy on which they can both agree. Otherwise the relationship's tendencies toward addiction or codependency could cause one or both of the partners to be hurt by their own unrealistic assessment of what is going on.

Taurus I's may be fascinated by their Taurus-Gemini lover's mind, Taurus-Gemini by Taurus I physical endowments and prowess. But Taurus-Gemini may prove too fickle a customer for Taurus I: infidelity, jealousy and outright competition can surface here, marring an otherwise fruitful relationship. If forgiving, understanding or permissive attitudes are developed, however, with the partners allowing each other free rein in spending time with other people (although probably drawing the line at outright sexual infidelity), the relationship might well stand the test of time in love and marriage.

Taurus-Gemini have much to learn from Taurus I's about hard work and sticking to the task at hand, while Taurus I's will benefit from a Taurus-Gemini example of flexibility and adaptability. Whether as co-workers, lovers or marriage partners, these two can work well side by side, filling in each other's deficiencies and appreciating each other's strengths. There is often a strong physical attraction between them, which can lead to intense sexual encounters; this intensity can also be sublimated into mutually rewarding competition, on the playing field or in the board room.

These two make good friends, particularly if they can freely and easily exchange ideas in the intellectual or philosophical sphere. Taurus-Gemini will not always meet the Taurus I expectation of fidelity and deep involvement, however, and the friendship may be irritated by missed appointments and other irresponsibilities. Taurus I parents' patience will be severely tested by energetic Taurus-Gemini children, and their need for peace and quiet at home after a hard day at work may be frustrated in this relationship.

ADVICE: Develop tolerance. Minimize rules and condemning attitudes. Cultivate sports or exercise. Keep a handle on violent emotions. Meditate.

Having Fun

This relationship is at its best when it is undemanding; having fun together and avoiding serious subjects are usually the best approaches here. Taurus I's and Gemini I's relate to each better as acquaintances or occasional companions than as close friends or spouses. Should they try to get closer, irritation, impatience and straightforward dislike may mar this pleasurable if somewhat superficial relationship.

Gemini I's often benefit from accepting a career position that is not too demanding but provides the stability they need; a Taurus I supervisor, colleague, owner or boss can serve them well in this respect. Marriages between these two may not work out so well, however, especially if Taurus I's make heavy demands on their Gemini I partners. Gemini I's must feel a sense of responsibility on their own, and act on it in their own good time and way, no matter how curious their methods seem. Taurus I's, however, often demand that their partner act responsibly and according to a fixed set of standards. This may be more than a Gemini I can bear.

In love affairs, sexual attraction is likely to be strong and playful. The relationship may not prove deep or all that productive, however. Sometimes, in fact, it is a covert affair, and particularly one in which either or both partners is already involved with or committed to someone very different from both themselves and the covert partner. Although such hidden liaisons are unlikely to be enduring, they may provide the psychological reinforcement and strength needed to make a decision—to continue the established relationship or leave it.

As parents, Taurus I's are likely to prove restrictive or smothering to their Gemini I children. Gemini I parents, on the other hand, are unlikely to provide their Taurus I children with the emotional stability they need. Siblings of this combination enjoy, understand and mutually support each other, despite their differences in temperament.

A Love of Bed and Table

Characterized by a nearly all-absorbing sensuality, this relationship is likely to be quite unconventional. A certain rebelliousness is inherent in it, as the duo pursues the pleasures of food, love, wine and entertainment, no matter what the cost. Despite this tendency to indulge, or perhaps because of it, when they decide to get down to work, or set themselves a task or goal, they cannot be dissuaded until they achieve their aim.

In love, Gemini II's are often drawn to strong silent types, and Taurus I's may not have the dark and complex emotional side that can arouse and hold them. This pair may make better spouses than lovers, since the relationship's love of table, bed and steady, dependable physicality generally finds more fulfillment in a domestic setting than in a romantic one. Taurus I's will have to become good listeners, however, for Gemini II's need to be heard and understood. The strikingly new and original forms of verbal expression that are their trademark can prove attractive but also wearing to a Taurus I more interested in forceful action than in glib theorizing. If Gemini II's can back up their words with deeds, and be counted upon to assume daily tasks without complaint, Taurus I's may find themselves quite happy with this sparkling partner.

The sharing of sensual pleasures is unlikely to prove a sufficient basis for a friendship in this combination. In fact, these two are likely to be irritated by each other's know-it-all attitudes; neither will give the other full credit or sympathy. Relaxed and open sharing of intimate problems is not usually in the cards for this relationship, usually due to a lack of deep trust and also a certain amount of competitiveness.

Work and family relationships can initially be filled with difficulties and conflict. Gemini II's are usually much too idiosyncratic in their approach to everyday problems to satisfy the inflexible expectations of Taurus I's as to how things should be done. Furthermore, Gemini II's can be terribly critical of a Taurus I co-worker, parent or sibling, who may become first defensive, later aggressive under this barrage of blame, finally slinking off hurt, or withdrawing completely.

ADVICE: Work on sharing. Minimize tension. Talking is not enough. Let what you do show what you think. Hang in for the duration.

GEMINI III

Kaleidoscopic Diversity

This relationship's great need for variety and change can undermine its stability but also contribute to keeping it alive. Even when responsibility and reliability are at their strongest here, there is usually also a yearning for new and challenging pursuits. Because the energy in the relationship is so restless, almost explosive, it requires a very narrow focus if it is to be successful. Moreover, its frenetic pace is generally too much for the domestic life.

Should marriage occur in this combination, change and diversity will have to be cultivated constantly. Otherwise, each party may create it by himself, perhaps in the form of a secret lover—or else maybe through a passion for independent travel, or for a hobby or sport that will dominate his thoughts and actions. Rarely will the partners risk damaging their relationship irreparably, but neither will they give up their often obsessive extracurricular (or extramarital) interests. Usually the most practical tack is to refuse to acknowledge the depth of the outside involvement, or even to reveal it. This approach can work out for years, since the relationship also has a penchant for self-deception, which acts as a protective shield.

Neither love nor friendship between these two is likely to be long-lasting, for there is a mutual lack of chemistry here, and few common points that could lead to a deep emotional attachment. This lack of commonality, and a curious kind of personal envy, may undermine Taurus I–Gemini III family relationships, whether between parents and children or between siblings. Taurus I's may often envy the detachment shown by Gemini III's, who for their part may be jealous of Taurus I composure and patience, which they appear to despise but actually secretly long for in themselves. Taurus I bosses may find Gemini III employees hard or impossible to control, but as co-workers on an equal footing, these two will probably get along quite well. As business partners, similarly, Gemini III's bring surprising good sense and financial wisdom to deals inspired and directed by Taurus I's, as well as astute analytic and critical judgment.

ADVICE: Don't tell all, but don't hide everything, either. Find points of commonality. Fulfill responsibilities in an enjoyable way.

THE CUSP OF MAGIC
GEMINI-CANCER CUSP

Sizzling Spell

For two such traditional people, this relationship holds a surprisingly fiery independence. Therein lies its considerable attraction. It makes its partners take risks and leaps of faith, and pushes them to base decisions on intuitive hunches, more than either ever would on his own. This can feel very freeing and, if the relationship is a romantic one, can make the flames of ardor burn more brightly.

Taurus I's and Gemini-Cancers can easily fall under the relationship's spell in matters of love. Hunches, spontaneity and first impulses are likely to be strengths here, given the relationship's focus on intuition. The ethereal nature of many Gemini-Cancers can thoroughly captivate earthy Taurus I's, and the harmony, repose or beauty of Taurus I's can prove irresistible to romantic Gemini-Cancers, but all spells eventually wear off, and only time will tell whether the relationship will endure. On the other hand, negativity, power struggles and loss of respect rarely surface in this couple's love affairs, making it possible for them to continue, whether developing into marriage or transforming into friendship, for many years. Burning with a steady flame, the relationship usually justifies the initially sizzling love attraction.

Friendships in this combination are rare unless preceded by a romantic or working relationship—these two rarely start out by being interested in each other as friends. Taurus I's will most likely find Gemini-Cancers a bit strange, and Gemini-Cancers will pull back from the direct approach of Taurus I's, resenting what they perceive as aggression and lack of sensitivity. Taurus I parents can be captivated by their refined Gemini-Cancer children, who will usually know how to manipulate through roundabout and seductive means. Gemini-Cancer parents can provide the warm and nurturing environment so important to Taurus I. At work, Gemini-Cancers will respect Taurus I dedication but may not approve of their ethics or attitude on the job, seeing them as exaggerated and self-satisfied. Taurus I's, on the other hand, may find Gemini-Cancers a bit too relaxed.

ADVICE: Like wine, love should be enjoyed while it lasts. Keep friendships alive. Beware of being overly impulsive. Let intentions be judged by deeds.

THE WEEK OF THE EMPATH

Proving Ground

Standing up for oneself, or for what one believes in, is the core lesson in this relationship. A certain combativeness is inherent here, especially when the issue is personal freedom—which is likely to be the case. The upside is that participants in this relationship will learn how to take a stand, protecting themselves and their relationship against anyone who would have them be any other way.

The relationship's spotlight will fall on the Cancer I: will he or she be able to achieve freedom and independence here? An ultracapable Taurus I may provide the protection that Cancer I's so desperately need, but the price they pay for this security may be the inhibition of their personal growth. Cancer I's may already have encountered a Taurus I in childhood, as a parent, sibling, aunt, uncle or teacher, and their extreme empathy will make them eager to please a Taurus I by obeying this partner's commands and wishes faithfully, at the expense of their own self-expression. Eventually the Cancer I will have to find a way to be self-assertive, perhaps prompting an explosion of resentment and feeling.

Even without a Taurus I figure in their childhood, adult Cancer I's may unconsciously replay an old script with a Taurus-I lover, mate or boss, much to this partner's bafflement. Taurus I's can also find themselves manipulated by charming yet unconscious Cancer-Geminis, but, in their usual fashion, they may refuse to take action. Eventually there will have to be a confrontation. Taurus I's and Cancer I's can often form successful love and even marital relationships when they meet later in life, after each has had time to develop more awareness. As a friendship, this combination may offer a ground for working out personal problems and for developing trust and understanding. It is a nurturing relationship that is generally rewarding, as long as it avoids undue dependency. At work, Cancer I's are better off operating by themselves, often at home, but they bring a financial astuteness to a working relationship with Taurus I, perhaps as a business partner or colleague. It is essential, however, that the balance between them be kept objective and equal.

ADVICE: Work on self-understanding. Learn to give and take. Avoid dependencies. Stand on your own two feet. Free yourself from old scripts.

A Unique Penchant

The challenge of this pairing is to accept originality. The relationship simply will not be governed by the usual social codes or rules of conduct; together, these two need to do things their own way. Being original has its advantages, however, and the duo's inventiveness can contribute to many fields of endeavor.

On the face of it, apparently impractical and overimaginative Cancer II's might seem much too strange for inherently conservative Taurus I's, yet they may often pique these personalities' curiosity and arouse their emotions. It is Cancer II's, in fact, who are unlikely to be interested in Taurus I's; inevitably attracted to more casual types, often with a dark side, they usually find Taurus I's dull and predictable. A Taurus I's desire for a Cancer II can often be hopeless, then, but should an atypical Taurus I have a quiet Venusian charm, and a hidden penchant for the unusual or bizarre, these two may be able to form a relationship, whether as lovers or as friends. If so, it will probably be highly original, especially in the sexual, aesthetic or social spheres. Taurus I's and Cancer II's could marry and lead an eventful life together. They might eventually lead separate lives, quite detached from each other, yet each will have a quiet admiration for his very different partner, which friends and family may never quite understand.

Taurus I parents will often demand from their children the one thing of which Cancer II's are incapable: being normal. This may engender feelings of hurt on both sides, unless the Taurus I's are willing to drop or amend their expectations. Cancer II parents are unlikely to provide the attention and security needed by their Taurus I children, who may be embarrassed by their attitudes and behavior in front of relatives and friends.

ADVICE: Normalcy can be as strange to some as the bizarre is to others. Find common points. Build creatively. Don't be ashamed of being different.

Mutual Expression

This relationship concerns itself with all forms of expression. The channels of communication between these two must be open and direct, and other forms of expression, creative and otherwise, are also very important to them. The relationship is apt to be highly original, requiring more than just cooking up ideas. It has a deep need to manifest or actualize its creativity in the material world—whether through art, a business, or children, or simply as physical expression or body language.

Particularly important in this relationship is taking the time to understand not only thoughts but feelings. When this is done, marriages in this combination can be solid, effective, powerful units that will work even better if Cancer III's commit to them fully, and if they modify their need to be at center stage and to control. But the relationship often never gets off the ground, since many Cancer III's are attracted to a very different type, one more exciting and unreliable than Taurus I's—who may, however, be the ones best able to give them what they really need.

These two can build a successful working relationship as long as there is mutual respect. Without it, competitive drives and jealousies can get out of hand, particularly if either party sees the other as a threat to his or her present or future position within an organization or field. Should the Taurus I have the higher position, the Cancer III may be intimidated or made to feel insecure, and may become manipulative in trying to control and ultimately overcome the Taurus I's superiority. Should both personalities have their eye on the same position, Taurus I ruthlessness will meet its match in the Cancer III drive toward success, which will only become more pronounced when insecurities are aroused.

In the family, whether the relationship manifests as parent-child or sibling pairs, it can be protective and caring. But a Taurus I or Cancer III parent or older sibling can also prove bossy and even smothering of the younger family member, with a breakdown of relations or a total lack of communication being the final result.

ADVICE: If flowers are to grow, the gardener sometimes has to back off. Don't play God. Reach compromises. Keep lines of communication open.

Off on Their Own

The challenge of this relationship is whether its need for variety and change can be satisfied without undermining its stability—which, fortunately, is quite strong and abiding. It has a tendency to hang in there, and when it appears in friendship, love or marriage, it resists quitting or admitting failure. With that kind of bedrock foundation, the partners can securely go their own way and pursue their own interests. The ideal, of course, would be for them to go through changes and seek interesting pursuits together, but Cancer-Leos in particular need to go off on their own—a trait that will demand understanding from their faithful Taurus I partner, who must not view it as implying rejection, disinterest or infidelity. Cancer-Leos themselves must realize that Taurus I's will not allow their interests to be compromised, no matter how accepting or understanding they are, and must learn when to curtail or halt some of their activities.

At work, this relationship can prove acceptable or even promising, providing that Cancer-Leos' need for risk-taking at certain moments does not upset more conservative Taurus I's. But for the most part, Cancer-Leos are cautious enough to meet Taurus I standards for security, and in fact the relationship often has the effect of increasing their self-discipline.

In the family, Taurus I relatives may view Cancer-Leos with despair, seeing them as unstable, self-destructive and poor role models for the young. Cancer-Leos may respond to these views with skepticism or laughter—they see themselves as quite responsible, and Taurus I's, often, as unimaginative, inhibiting and judgmental.

Cancer-Leos looking for a romantic fling are often attracted to highly physical Taurus I's, who will be happy to join in the fun but will also demand something more serious than Cancer-Leos have to offer. Such relationships generally have little stability and, although they may provide intense satisfaction, will probably dissolve fast.

ADVICE: Even understanding has its limits. Don't push too hard. Preserve understanding and sensitivity. Beware of selfishness.

Monumental Scale

Expansion is the theme of this pairing—the playing out of feelings, thoughts, actions and ideas on a monumental scale. The relationship tends to force its partners beyond themselves, indeed even beyond the ordinary limits of time and space, and it would come as no surprise to find this pair involved in the metaphysical. In any case, doing things in a big way comes naturally to them. The result is that the relationship makes them advance beyond the point where they would normally choose to go, since individually they have a tendency to dig in their heels and resist change. Loyalty, integrity and responsibility are the keywords of this relationship, and woe to the party that lets the other down in a pinch. In meetings between these two, the irresistible force (Leo I) meets the immovable object (Taurus I). Because Leo and Taurus are square (at 90°) to each other in the zodiac, one could expect conflict here. Sparks may indeed fly, but they can just as easily ignite the flames of passion, or stimulate a group endeavor, as they can unleash hostility and destructive forces.

As friends, these two make a strong duo, resistant to outside influences. A lifelong friendship may result after the dust has cleared from initial confrontations. Love and family relationships between these two are likely to be stormy and filled with conflict. Taurus I's are generally more sensuous and fond of repose, Leo I's more passionate and dynamic; these differences can prove divisive and lead to misunderstandings.

Given the stubborn nature of the participants, marriages in this combination can prove difficult, particularly since each party has a need to rule the roost. In rare circumstances, they may be able to share the dominant role in the family, but it more often happens that children and other family members find themselves the observers of periodic struggles for power. Should these two share a larger and loftier philosophical goal, they may set aside their differences in style for the greater good. Few compare to these two when it comes to conviction and commitment. At work, the relationship is characterized by an idealistic pragmatism.

ADVICE: When sparks start to fly, anything nearby is likely to ignite. Keep destructive emotions under control. Bear the greater good in mind.

The Strong, Silent Type

The tone of this relationship is often strong and silent, with a knack for looking to the future. Sensuous expression is extremely strong, but feelings are usually kept under control, giving the relationship a quality of objectivity and cold detachment. Lines of defense are clearly drawn, and quarrels and differences are left unaddressed, in the hope that they will eventually subside. In hard times, the relationship will have a capacity to foresee upcoming problems and virtually to move mountains in order to restore equilibrium.

These two make an unlikely romantic pair, but once together they will tend to hang in there. If the romantic flame begins to fade, Taurus I's will see the need for change first but won't always be sure what direction to take. Leo II's, on the other hand, may exhibit masochistic tendencies in refusing to recognize a problem but will be able to create a plan for the future that can make the relationship more tolerable.

Marriages between these two are possible, since both are willing to commit. Characteristically, the visualization of a future state will aid or accompany the decision to marry; generally, in fact, a realistic attitude often prevails here, in which romance is not seen as a necessary ingredient. Instead, practical matters, especially financial planning, are pictured as taking up a great deal of time. The sexual side of the relationship may also be seen in pragmatic and nonidealized terms. Children of this combination will often find their parents devoted and at times enthusiastic about their progress, particularly in the areas of sports and academic achievement.

Working relationships here are unlikely to gel: as business partners or as a boss-employee pair, these two are apt to become embroiled in power struggles. But if both occupy an equal position as co-workers in an organization or firm, they can make a strong combination and prove extremely useful to the group. As siblings within a family structure, they may similarly provide a backbone of stability, as long as they don't clash with each other emotionally, especially through competition for parental attention or jealousy over material goods.

ADVICE: Fires eventually die out if the embers aren't stirred occasionally. Acknowledge and empower the unexpected. Risk taking is important. Dare to fail.

Magical Success

The magical coalescence of strengths here can be especially successful in the area of career—but a certain romance and sensitivity are also at work. The combination bodes well, then, for virtually any endeavor. Together these two are inspired, seeming to be able to intuit what's necessary for success.

Both Taurus I and Leo III are dominant types, so work and business relationships between them might seem to be difficult or impossible. But there is a subtle difference in their dominance: Leo III's have to lead but not necessarily to control, whereas to Taurus I's, leadership is less important than ruling the roost. This is an unbeatable commercial combination, then, with Leo III's reorganizing, planning ever new conquests and leading the team into battle while Taurus I's guard home base and keeps things running smoothly. If trouble arises, it is usually when their duties and responsibilities overlap, but dedication and an awareness of what works best can minimize this pair's power struggles and ego conflicts, making the relationship truly formidable.

Love affairs, friendships and marriages between Leo III's and Taurus I's are rockier propositions, despite a certain inspired romantic glow. Taurus I's may be attracted to Leo III energy but will ultimately find it too unpredictable, disturbing or even violent; Leo III's, on the other hand, may bore easily with the soft sensuousness of their Taurus I partners. The biggest single difference, however, lies in the issue of harmony, which Leo III's mistrust (a boring or uneventful love or friendship, no matter how pleasurable, is usually intolerable for them) and Taurus I's need. Leo III's can also find Taurus I partners too fixed and unwilling to change. Even when it's obvious that things are not going well, Taurus I's may simply ignore suggestions of changes, or, if they are stated as demands, may stubbornly resist them. Marriage works best here when it also contains a business component—when the spouses also run some kind of commercial enterprise together. The kind of division of labor that is a prerequisite in business will spill over into the domestic scene, causing greater peace at home.

ADVICE: Bring magic into your personal life. Balance predictability and unpredictability. Minimize needless conflicts. Be more romantic.

 LEO-VIRGO CUSP

Moment of Truth

This relationship's focus on knowledge may result in a kind of ongoing curiosity. The relationship particularly manifests a desire to find the answers to puzzles and mysteries. Their investment in knowing all can mean that these partners play emotional hide-and-seek, not only with each other but with others curious about what makes this strange duo click. Simultaneously wanting full knowledge and choosing not to reveal all of themselves, sooner or later they will usually be found out. This moment of truth can either end the relationship or prolong it, depending on whether or not they like what they see.

If the relationship is a friendship or a love affair, it can continue for years, with mutual benefit to both parties. These two can have fun with their complex games, puzzles, psychological investigations and physical exploration. The relationship can also lead them to career advancement, each introducing the other to people who have helpful connections or outright offers to make.

Marriage is a possibility for this combination, but Leo-Virgos are rarely too interested in raising children, which cause nurturing Taurus I's a certain frustration. They in turn will have to be understanding of the Leo-Virgo need to be alternately introverted and extroverted—whichever side is dominant at the time. In some cases, this relationship may have an unfavorable effect on the self-realization process of Leo-Virgos, who can fall into an apathetic or self-satisfied state from which their accepting Taurus I mates will not try to push them.

Leo-Virgos may share some of their deepest secrets with Taurus I parents or siblings, whom they will generally find trustworthy in respecting their confidences. At the same time, they themselves may be far too taken up with their own inner world and emotions to give Taurus I's the understanding and appreciation they need in return.

ADVICE: Get more involved. Pry less. Make wholehearted commitments. Don't get caught up in idle pursuits. Try to play at a higher level.

VIRGO I

A Good Dose of Happiness

A solid bond of empathy, respect and understanding is forged in this relationship, which usually has an easy camaraderie. These two know how to leave each other alone—their bond, often deepened over years, allows room for each partner's privacy. Happily, they can build a comfortable home together, and will always share a similar outlook on money and handle it well. This can be an excellent partnership for marriage or career.

In matters of love, the relationship may not be high in passion. Yet its ability to satisfy the partners' mutual needs can bring it longevity, and its accepting attitudes will provide them with a good measure of happiness. If problems arise, it will be Virgo I criticism, dissatisfaction and self-destructive tendencies that create them. Care should be taken to relieve the Virgo I's frustrations and issues, by acknowledging them and adjusting priorities accordingly. Taurus I's will enjoy playing the dominant role in this relationship, benefiting from the Virgo I desire to be helpful and to serve.

Since Virgo I's need to spend a great deal of time alone, and are often busy with family and work obligations, one would not expect them to form deep friendships with Taurus I's, who demand a healthy investment of time and energy. The strongest friendships between these two will most likely grow out of working relationships, or develop between more distant family members.

Taurus I bosses and Virgo I employees often work well together, as do Taurus I parents and Virgo I children. A productive and positive relationship here can mean a great deal to the continued existence of the companies and families of which they are a part.

ADVICE: Empathy should not lead to apathy. Seek deeper challenges. Beware of self-sacrifice. Involve yourself more in the world.

Uncharted Waters

This relationship can move in uncharted waters. A zany side in both partners will be magnified here, allowing them to externalize their fantasies and let it all hang out. Thus the relationship can become a marvelous arena for expressiveness, and for the release of hitherto suppressed desires. Humor too can play a prominent and delightful role. The question is: once Pandora's box is opened, can the spirits released be controlled or contained again? Should the relationship get out of control, it can threaten its partners' mental stability.

Interpersonal relationships based on choice—friendships, love and marriage—can be quite successful here. Taurus I protective and nurturing instincts are put to good use in cherishing Virgo II's who may have retreated into a private inner world; the relationship can strengthen their egos, as Taurus I's gently accompany and encourage them toward increased social contact. Virgo II's, on the other hand, allow Taurus I's to rediscover their playful side and to share imaginative visions in a noncondemning relationship. Friendships between these two may be involved in unusual hobbies or interests, and unconventional types of fun are the hallmark of all their activities.

Working matchups between these two are unlikely to work out: not only do they usually lack the emotional understanding granted in personal relations in this combination, but Taurus I pragmatic demands may be beyond a Virgo II's abilities to meet. Thus the co-worker situation can feature an impatience and frustration that hinder the effective completion of the job at hand.

In the family, siblings in this combination can influence each other positively, provided they can get along emotionally; parents, however, may feel that they overstimulate each other. Parent-child combinations, on the other hand, may have problems with communication, acceptance and mutual comprehension, unless united by an unusual or unconventional lifestyle.

Profit Factor

A dogged determination to make things work, particularly in the career area, will feature strongly here. Both partners are pragmatic enough to know what is expected of them and can usually keep their temperature cool and their irritation threshold high. In whatever sphere the relationship manifests, it will show a great interest in career matters, being especially concerned with job improvement and concomitant salary hikes. It will generally work out better if the Taurus I and Virgo III are co-workers rather than boss and employee. Often, the partners' determination is sparked or strengthened by the success-oriented stance of the relationship itself. Not surprisingly, it may achieve its greatest success as a business partnership, featuring the sharp management, production, marketing and sales skills needed to achieve high earnings.

Love and marital relationships are likely to be more vulnerable to dissension and discord. It is possible, however, for Taurus I pretension and snobbishness, and Virgo III selectivity and rigidity, to loosen. Virgo III's will tend to be more uncomfortable than Taurus I's with the combination's occasional instabilities. A love of table and bed appears often in this matchup, and if the partners' physical attraction is strong enough, they both may find this combination pleasurable and fulfilling. Virgo III's are likely to have difficulty with the fixed nature of the relationship, which will make them feel trapped; Taurus I's are more accepting of total commitment.

Friendships are unlikely to develop here, given the partners' differing interests and approaches, and their tendency to pick friends who are more fun than responsible. Parent-child relationships of either combination are likely to be stormy. As siblings, however, these two may form a tight bond to promote their mutual interests against the powerful pressures, whether social, financial or parental, that are arrayed against them.

ADVICE: Let things happen. Don't feel you always have to hold it together. Give your willpower and stubbornness a rest occasionally. Lighten up.

THE CUSP OF BEAUTY
VIRGO-LIBRA CUSP

Artistic Dominance

Ambition, or the desire to dominate others in a particular field, is the prime mover here. This pair will often in some way be involved in the arts, where they may slowly but surely climb to the top. They will do whatever it takes to get there, insisting on their supremacy and developing quite a bit of resourcefulness along the way. This isn't to say that they lack refinement; in fact they have a great deal in common in terms of aesthetic appreciation, and they also share business acumen. Their biggest problem is that they want everyone around them to agree with them.

Love relationships here aim for a calm, grounded, measured approach, and are geared toward the outside world. But severe temperamental differences between these partners can lead to clashes: high-strung, unstable and nervous Virgo-Libras may annoy their more grounded Taurus I partners, who, however, are tough, and may be well suited to fulfilling the Virgo-Libra need for a stable, reliable figure. Should the couple decide to get married, things may go well during good times, but the relationship is not intrinsically resilient and resourceful in dealing with difficulties or outright disasters. Furthermore, there will often be an attitude of denying or ignoring problems that could be handled easily and efficiently if they were dealt with promptly, but will prove difficult if left too late. On the positive side, the creation of a beautiful home may be one of this pair's great joys and solid strengths, and an area where they may focus on something other than career.

Taurus I–Virgo-Libra friendships are likely to be fun, but not psychologically supportive or stable—they do not provide the insights or the orientation conducive to self-understanding or empathy. When the combination appears in the family, however, not only parents but, often, relatives such as aunts, uncles or grandparents of either sign are likely to form an effective relationship with children of the other sign, encouraging their growth and success. As ambitious as these two are together, working at the same company can bring out their competitiveness unless their roles are clearly defined. The same is true for business partners.

ADVICE: Tend to small problems immediately. Don't get caught in a material web. Recognize that yours is not the only point of view. Cultivate an internal life.

THE WEEK OF THE PERFECTIONIST
LIBRA I

A Chaotic Whirl

As a unit, this couple is powerfully persuasive in getting its way, but within the relationship itself manipulative attitudes may prove disturbing and disempowering, especially over the long haul. Both of these partners like things done a certain way, but not necessarily the same way. So the stage is set for argument, as each personality tries to persuade the other, usually through logic and reason, that their way of handling things is best. Should the two be united in their outlook, however, whether in a business, social or family setting, they can prove a potent reorganizing or reforming force.

The thrust of this relationship's need to persuade is usually practical rather than moral; it is based on common sense—at least as the persuader sees it. The "best" way of doing something, however, is often quite unrealistic here, as these two together tend to find not only exceedingly complex ways of accomplishing very simple things, but very simple solutions to potentially intricate problems. Marriages and friendships between these two are likely to be plagued by such contrasting methodologies, which can sometimes lend spice and humor but will ultimately get old and tiresome.

Love affairs here tend to be colorful but unrealistic. A relationship between Taurus I's and Libra I's exhibits some of the classic instability predicted by a quincunx aspect (150° apart in the zodiac), but since both Taurus and Libra are ruled by Venus, there is also a connection in matters of aesthetics and love. Still, love is truly blind here, as this relationship goes a long way to prove. When these two fall in love, ardor, foolishness, smugness, feigned emotion, posing, half-truths and manipulation all vie for the ascendancy. This chaotic whirl of feeling is not usually conducive to the relationship's long life or health.

Sibling pairings, particularly between members of the same sex, are likely to show dominant-submissive, extrovert-introvert and sadomasochistic overtones. The challenge is to find a balance in mood, and an equality that will allow each partner to develop on their own separate path.

ADVICE: Let people make up their own minds. Work on making your outlook more realistic. Promote equality. Try to see more than one side of any situation.

Giving Direction

Focusing on boundaries, this relationship is strong in the areas of both structure and fantasy. Its principal challenge, then, may be to reconcile the two, or to apply rules and organization to imagination, creativity and play. Clearly this talent can allow the pair to work well as parents, as bosses, or as directors of, say, a club or team. They make an effective and understanding duo when it comes to acting in concert to give direction to a group.

Libra II's stand to benefit from marriages, love affairs and friendships with Taurus I's, who give them the solidity and dependability they so sorely need. Not only can they enchant and amuse the Taurus I in return, but, more important, they have the objectivity to encourage such a partner's personal development by supplying profound psychological insight into his or her own character. The relationship's outstanding weakness is that these two will tend to procrastinate, especially in decisions about the home, career, or financial obligations. Paralysis, avoidance and even breakdowns may sometimes set in when such decisions need to be made. But the couple will finally rally themselves and apply some organized thought to the situation at hand.

The hedonism in a Taurus I–Libra II friendship or marriage can become so pronounced that virtually all individual willpower is suspended. These partners may live in a pleasurable but notably unproductive vacuum. Libra II's will usually be more aggressive in trying to get things moving again, but in the face of formidable Taurus I resistance they may just give up, or take to sulking, nail-biting or other forms of escape or frustration.

Many types of work relationships between these two may not fly due to differences in style. Libra II's are generally unable to keep working away at something week after week, project after project, the way their Taurus I co-workers do—at least not without ill effects to their health. In families, similarly, Taurus I parents or siblings may grow frustrated with the inability or reluctance of Libra II's to give themselves wholeheartedly to domestic matters, leaving chores undone.

ADVICE: Beware of drifting and dreaming. Set realistic goals and achieve them. Understand your capabilities. Fight the desire to postpone.

THE WEEK OF THEATER
 LIBRA III

Conflicting Tendencies

The Taurus I–Libra III relationship will have its ins and outs and its ups and downs. The combination is bound to concern itself with trying to reconcile its partners' conflicting natures. A great deal of energy will need to be devoted to creating something settled between these two, thereby stunting the overall possibilities for the growth of the relationship or of its partners. The upshot is that certain areas are difficult or unlikely, particularly relationships such as marriage, involving children and a settled family life.

Taurus I's need to settle down, Libra III's resist it. Furthermore, a Taurus I's nurturing abilities will have no object in a Libra III, who probably won't want to be around a lot of the time. This will take most of the fun out of the relationship for the Taurus I. Group activities involving these two, whether social or business, are also problematic, given both the Taurus I's need to run the show and the Libra III's relative lack of interest in other people. The best roles for this duo would be as hard-driving executive partners in a business with well-defined roles.

More intimate relationships are likely to be unstable and stormy, especially if initial sexual energies run high. Taurus I's will not react well to a Libra III's alternate coolness and explosiveness in confrontations; their stubbornness will kick in and their placid side will be tested. Libra III's instinctively know how to push the buttons of Taurus I's, making them exasperated or desperate. To top it off, the Libra III will probably grow bored with the Taurus I in the end.

Friendships in this combination are likely to be unstable, and are not recommended. As sports opponents or team partners, however, this duo can be irresistible, sweeping the field before them. Family relations may be idealized, affectionate and giving, particularly between father and daughter, mother and son, and same-sex siblings. This tightly knit bond can prove the strongest axis in the family, but will also feature tremendous displays of temperament and furious confrontations, which relatives would be wise to stay out of.

ADVICE: Try to keep on an even keel. Emotions should be put to constructive or pleasurable use. Get a bit tougher and don't let your buttons be pushed.

THE CUSP OF DRAMA & CRITICISM
 LIBRA-SCORPIO CUSP

Conceptual Thought

This relationship is very much at home in the world of ideas and ideologies. Both parties bring to it a bias toward the kind of conceptual thought that is geared toward the pragmatic; this can be a powerful unifying force. Innovation and can be a positive offshoot of the relationship, making it a good combination for business or group endeavors. In personal relationships with each other, these two are apt to find the relationship somewhat hard to pin down or define.

The relationship may well feature a sharing of intellectual and aesthetic interests, and Taurus I's are likely to be in awe of Libra-Scorpio mental powers, and proud to be in a relationship that gives serious consideration to their own thoughts. But Libra-Scorpios are also likely to criticize or denigrate the ideas of Taurus I's, who will take such attacks personally. This can cause great upset. In the romantic or marital sphere, somewhat similarly, Libra-Scorpios may move in passionate and ecstatic realms that leave a Taurus I partner behind, on the plane of physical sensation. And their energies, sometimes erupting cataclysmically out of control in the form of scathing or sarcastic commentary, can hurt, bewilder or even frighten more stolid and calm Taurus I's, who may retreat in confusion, or simply be immobilized in a state of shock. On the positive side, however, such relationships are likely to provide strong economic security, featuring good investments, strong earning patterns and shrewd use of funds on a daily basis.

The most successful possibility for this combination may be friendship, where many of the pair's strengths can manifest without accompanying emotional turmoil. Since power struggles and sexual combat do not come into play here, the friendship may prove pleasurable, stable, psychologically supportive and intellectually interesting. In both the business and the family spheres, this duo can be a force for rationality and common sense. Its attitudes generally prove constructive and forward-looking. The relationship enhances the traditional side of both parties, who, particularly together, tend to promote values that have stood the test of time.

ADVICE: Try to keep on an even keel. Promote financial endeavors. Cultivate group and organizational skills. Minimize power struggles.

THE WEEK OF INTENSITY
SCORPIO I

Running the Gamut

Opposites attract—and how! Since Taurus I and Scorpio I are 180° apart in the zodiac, it is not surprising that a strong magnetic pull should be present here. And this initial attraction is nothing compared to the energies that can be generated, both for the good and the bad, once the relationship gets moving. Indeed this matchup runs the full gamut of expressiveness, from the most brilliant to the most passionate. Yet these are quintessentially fixed personalities, and their synergetic melding presents a solid and formidable exterior to the world. In short this can be an unbeatable combination, at work, on the playing field or in a family or social group.

Should these two fall deeply in love, they are likely to soar to the heights of physical sensation and sexual ecstasy, but they must beware of getting stuck there. Their passion can also be the prelude for spiritual forays, but they too often get mired in issues of possession and control, codependency and love addiction. Destructiveness can climb unacceptably here, with the relationship being rocked or torn apart by fierce battles for supremacy. Indeed the relationship's karma often seems to demand going this far before such conflicts can be finally resolved.

Taurus I–Scorpio I marriages don't usually do well if they grow from such love affairs. They have a better chance of success when they evolve out of friendships, where the bonds of trust, respect and tenderness that are so valuable in marriage can form in a less competitive context. Indeed friendships in this combination can be very close, approaching a true marriage of hearts and minds.

In the family, and especially in parent-child matchups, either possible arrangement of these two personalities will yield caring, protective and nurturing relationships, but also overprotective and controlling ones. Alas, the way out usually lies in the direction of rejection, rebellion or both.

ADVICE: Know when to stop. Be aware of negative forces. Don't get stuck in destructive attitudes. Cultivate trust and tenderness.

THE WEEK OF DEPTH

Take No Prisoners

The challenge of this relationship will be to preserve a balance of power. Both partners consider themselves authorities on a variety of subjects, and may be extremely intolerant of other points of view. When they agree, their friends and family may face a solid wall of opposition or authority. When they disagree, the relationship can be rocked by the sounds of battle. "Take no prisoners" and "Give no quarter" are commands not conducive to harmony and tranquillity, but these two are each other's equals, and they may need confrontations like these to satisfy their need for combat, sharpen their argumentative skills and provide them with opportunities for the thrill of victory. Strife may be satisfying here, in other words, until the relationship acknowledges a greater kick: the substantial results that accrue from mutual cooperation and understanding.

Marriages in this combination are likely to have rather a heavy feel, but can be long-lasting, not to mention long-suffering. Successful in many respects, including financially and careerwise, they will feature day-to-day interactions in which wrestling for the reins of power, particularly in struggles over money, is never far away. Passions run high: joy, satisfaction, excitement, pain, suffering, depression. No matter what the partners' emotional or psychological state, they will inevitably return to the desire to acquire individual control and the need to give it up, whether through force or reason. Balance may eventually be achieved here, then, if only because of an inevitable averaging out of individual wins and losses, or, more positively, because of a realization that balance is essential for the relationship's health. The deep friendships that are possible here can be especially effective in promoting sports, family or social activities. They may become a bulwark of organizational dependability for a club or team, whether in fundraising, getting picnics or parties together or seeing to ordinary day-to-day problems. Familial relationships, on the other hand, particularly between siblings, are likely to be rocky. Particularly deadly may be struggles between two brothers or two sisters, where age differences will set up patterns of coercion and rebellion that may only be resolved later in life, if at all.

ADVICE: Pull together for the common good. Try to minimize ego and power struggles. Lighten up and have fun. Acting silly isn't shameful. Let things happen.

No Hassles

The slogan of this matchup could well be “No hassles.” These two usually make well-defined demands, but their relationship, particularly in marriage, is remarkable for keeping their requirements of each other to a minimum, and for settling for what is rather than what could be. Taurus I's enjoy being able to walk through the door and relax after a tough day; Scorpio III's like being appreciated for what they have to give. The relationship satisfies important needs, then, but also encourages the easy give-and-take that makes living worthwhile.

Taurus I–Scorpio III love is for the most part likely to be magnetic, physical and sensuous, reaching new highs in torrid sexuality, much to the enjoyment of both partners. Very occasionally, it may also be volcanic, unleashing hostility along with desire and passion. In marriages, the home can become a reliable and comfortable haven from the world's pressures. Fighting can be kept to a minimum and peaceful evenings will unfold. This is not to suggest that these two are by any means turned off, but, rather, that the relationship's emotional intelligence is high. There is an understanding here of the value of compromise and understanding, and a realization that impatience and constant anger are counterproductive and undesirable.

Both friendships and working relationships in this combination are often relaxed and productive. In neither of them are the partners polarized, and equality can be assumed to be the norm. At work, whether the Taurus I is the boss and the Scorpio III the employee or vice versa, power will not be seen as threatening nor service as demeaning.

Should Taurus I and Scorpio III be a father-daughter or mother-son combination, there is the risk of the child being spoiled. Scorpio III children may know how to turn on the charm and get their way with a Taurus I parent who may otherwise seem remarkably resistant.

ADVICE: Beware of lethargy. Seek stimulating activities. Don't fall into nonproductivity. Tension isn't always undesirable. Further the action.

SCORPIO-SAGITTARIUS CUSP

Lavish Tastes

The central problem of this relationship, and its greatest challenge, is giving direction and leadership to its activities. Taurus I's and Scorpio-Sagittarians seem to reinforce each other's procrastinating, so getting things done is often a problem here. Furthermore, both partners are busy a lot of the time with ideas and plans, so that the relationship may be occasionally lacking in the sphere of implementation. Lavish and excessive qualities, especially in the physical realm, will be magnified here: often, too much of the relationship's time and money will be spent on eating, drinking and luxury items.

Loyalty plays an important role in friendships between these two, who are usually sensitive and understanding toward each other. Scorpio-Sagittarians will see through the tough exterior of Taurus I's, instinctively recognizing and responding to their sensitive, emotional side; Taurus I's meanwhile know when to leave Scorpio-Sagittarians alone to empty and recharge, and also to mull over their ideas in peace.

Love affairs, on the other hand, will put loyalty to the test. Scorpio-Sagittarians who are highly responsive to a Taurus I partner may still not make them the exclusive object of their affections. It is not so much that Taurus I's are incapable of satisfying them as that Scorpio-Sagittarians often get caught with their hand in more than one cookie jar. Their need for variety and change in sexual matters, and their difficulty in avoiding involvement with those they find attractive, prove a double problem in this relationship. Because Taurus I's are easily hurt, and feel rejected when Scorpio-Sagittarians roam, marriage in this combination is likely to be difficult.

Family and working relationships between these two may be problematic for two reasons. First, conflicts over methods, ideas and plans usually prove an insurmountable barrier. Second, both parties like to run the show, and to give direction to their projects. While they fight over the wheel, unfortunately, the ship may be heading toward the rocks.

ADVICE: Try not to put things off. Keep on top of the situation. Give firm direction to projects. Agree on a course of action and stick to it.

Trials of Patience

The success of this relationship will be proportional to the degree to which the partners can patiently accept their individual differences for the sake of their mutual good. The relationship can cultivate objectivity and open-mindedness with some success if its partners are willing to give them a try. The final result may be that these two learn to accept and understand not only each other but those in their circle, friends, family, groups and others in general society. On the face of it, differences in approach may make it difficult for Taurus I's and Sagittarius I's to deal with each other effectively. Independent Sagittarius I's generally believe in education through the school of hard knocks, whereas more people-oriented Taurus I's live to implement ideas, which they often derive from either written or verbal models. Another difference is that move like greased lightning, while Taurus I's are steady and sure. Yet these contrasting attributes can enhance, deepen and enrich the Taurus I–Sagittarius I relationship, as long as acceptance is the central focus and patience prevails.

An emotional barrier in love and marriage may be the issue of give-and-take. Taurus I's have a strong nurturing side, which may be frustrated with Sagittarius I's, who are so independent that they will rarely accept help. Sagittarius I's do need to take, but often do so rather aggressively, in a way that makes them feel they have overcome or conquered something. Taurus I's have deep needs, but find it difficult to share feelings with self-centered and impatient Sagittarius I's.

Friendships and family relationships are more favorable. Parent-child combinations are likely to be mutually supportive and understanding. Of course, a Taurus I parent may be smothering and a Sagittarius I child wild and rebellious, but whichever personality falls into whichever role, the relationship is characterized by honesty and trustworthiness. Differences are accepted even in disagreements. Friendships are likely to be athletic or based on travel, even within a limited area. A love of nature and caring for pets can be shared and developed here, with particular emphasis on evolving a deeper understanding of biological and ecological matters.

ADVICE: Build on your strengths and diversity. Learn to take what's given and to give when taking. Lower your defenses. Share feelings at a deeper level when possible.

Hidden Repository

This complex relationship is governed by contrasting and often contradictory elements: acceptance versus rejection, rebellion versus a desire to please, the need to hide versus the need to reveal and share—all these impulses vie for the ascendancy. Of particular importance is knowing the time to conceal or expose aspects of oneself, or just information in general. Striking a balance between these two will often be a determining factor in how close the relationship will be. Sharing secrets is also a hallmark of the combination, and the relationship can become a repository of truths untold elsewhere. Sometimes its very existence will be based on the trust that its secrets will be kept—revealing what is private between these two could destroy it.

The relationship's intimacy will be predicated on whether and when its partners choose to expose themselves to each other. Sagittarius II's have definite problems with escapist tendencies, which, if revealed, will disturb Taurus I's, no matter how close or intense their love affair. The inability of Sagittarius II's to face responsibility, or perhaps their own addictions, can prove a problem; the Taurus I may accuse the Sagittarius II of failing to face up to reality, and the Sagittarius II will see this as a personal indictment. Taurus I's may secretly enjoy acting as protectors for Sagittarius II's, whom they perhaps view as flaky, while Sagittarius II's are apt to hide the fact that, deep down, they admire Taurus I solidity and orientation toward slow but sure achievement.

Marriages and friendships can be mutually supportive and understanding, albeit stressful. Because they have a low self-image, Sagittarius II's are initially suspicious of Taurus I advances, but in the end may become overly dependent on their highly capable partners. Taurus I's can feel good about the contributions they make to the relationship, but also frustrated at its inability to reach deeper levels of emotional interaction. And the deep need of Sagittarius II's for self-understanding and spiritual growth may similarly not be met in this relationship, so that they may have to be pursue this dimension outside of it. At work or in the family, the efforts of Taurus I's to build a team can be undercut by the extreme individualism of Sagittarius II's.

ADVICE: Aim for openness. Examine your need to keep secrets. Past fears need to be confronted. Beware of cutting yourself off from the world.

Refined Sensibilities

At first glance, one would expect the major theme of this relationship to be simple: a power struggle between two determined individuals. Taurus is an earth sign, making for a pragmatic, stubborn nature, while the personality of Sagittarius, a fire sign, is more expansive and high-minded. But this interpretation ignores the deeper forces at work here, and the nature of the two individuals. Together they can bring out many heretofore unexpressed aspects in each other, including a spiritual side, greater emotional trust and awareness, and the ability to explore the larger issues and meanings.

In love, marriage and friendship, the successful Taurus I–Sagittarius III relationship will exhibit very refined sensibilities, both in dealing with the world outside itself and in allowing its own partners to reach deeper layers of sharing and trust. In such mutual explorations, rational faculties and common sense meld well with emotional openness. The downside of this heightened awareness is a tendency to overreact or to be knocked off balance. Indeed, the sensitivity of the relationship can become a problem, forcing these two to build a wall to protect themselves, so that they appear much tougher and more pragmatic than they really are. One glance or silent acknowledgment, however, is enough to attest to the relationship's continuing closeness.

In the family, these two may well engage in power struggles, with highly negative results for both themselves and the larger group. Parent-child and sibling relationships are likely to feature battles of mammoth proportions; an inability to back down or compromise is characteristic. Unfortunately, the sensitivity here triggers upset more often than it is used to reach deeper levels of understanding.

At work, Taurus I's and Sagittarius III's may prove a strong and well-integrated combination. Usually functioning better as partners heading up a business than as boss-employee or co-worker pairs, they show a mutual respect for each other's talents and strengths. And conflict may be spared within their organization because of an instinctive realization that energies are better spent opposing competitors than fighting each other.

ADVICE: Stay open and trusting. Don't close off to feelings. Don't let your buttons be pushed so easily. Use sensitivity to reach deeper emotions.

THE CUSP OF PROPHECY
SAGITTARIUS-CAPRICORN CUSP

Plans and Logistics

This relationship will emphasize structure and the implementation of plans and ideas. These are the core of the Taurus I nature, but when it comes to putting concepts to work, Sagittarius-Capricorns are no slouches either. Love relationships here are a bit problematic, since the complexities and difficulties of the Sagittarius-Capricorn personality may be too much for Taurus I's to handle. What appear to be reasonable agreements, plans or conversations about logistics can be swept aside by an outburst of great emotional intensity, perhaps resulting from pent-up resentment or frustration. Stubbornness and recalcitrance are also characteristic here, resulting in a refusal to express emotion or to agree to reasonable discussion.

In families, marriages and the workplace, this duo can shine in organizational matters. But it has an emotionally unstable and depressive side that can emerge when things don't go according to plan. An atmosphere of insecurity may arise for apparently no reason at all here, leaving lowered self-esteem and lack of confidence in its wake. The relationship may work out best in the area of friendship, which can provide a non-threatening atmosphere in which to express or discuss hidden needs. The degree of honesty that can be achieved here is impossible in relationships where the partners feel they have a lot to lose. The friendship will rarely prove competitive, unless a third party is involved who is the object of both partners' affections.

Work partnerships can be very rewarding for these two, who will feel comfortable as team members or equals. They complement each other well, since Sagittarius-Capricorns are excellent project initiators while Taurus I's enjoy maintenance. The relationship's energies are well geared to teamwork and working behind the scenes, and it is ideally oriented to service of any kind. Furthermore, the psychic abilities of Sagittarius-Capricorns often allow them to peer into the future and get an idea of what lies ahead. Taurus I's are much too practical to acknowledge these powers and perceptions, which they will probably write off as hunches or luck.

ADVICE: Have confidence in yourself. When working, be objective and don't let feelings intrude. Show emotional intelligence. Make things easier.

From Matter to Spirit

The trine relationship (120° apart in the zodiac) between the earth signs of Taurus I and Capricorn I traditionally indicates an easygoingness, with a shared orientation toward work and sensuous pleasure. But this pair may aim at something more transcendent, beginning with the material but evolving toward the spiritual—not necessarily as a state in which they float through the world, at a distance from it, but as one in which they see the here and now in a more conscious and aware light. Since each personality brings a knowledge of and easy familiarity with material concerns to the relationship, together they can often take these things for granted, instead investigating aesthetic, religious, new-age and even psychic phenomena together.

Taurus I–Capricorn I love affairs emphasize an easy and highly pleasurable sensuality, although this is a sensuality of a kind conducive to reaching a kind of meditative or ecstatic peace in which matter is transcended and spirit liberated. Yet excesses in the area of food and drink, as well as sex and love addictions, are an ever-present danger here, and moderation must be observed or ill health can result.

Friendships and marriages between these two are strongly recommended. Practical matters will be handled efficiently and money will be well spent. For spouses, sharing the same activities enjoyed in love affairs—food, sex—may continue to be satisfying, but they will also enjoy creating a pleasant home together. One drawback of the combination may be a lack of push and drive, since the relationship is usually comfortable as it is, and may feel no need to strive toward difficult or impossible goals. On the one hand this makes it realistic, on the other it may also be a bit complacent and self-satisfied.

Parent-child relationships are often close and understanding, with nurturing playing a strong role, even when parents grow old and need the kind of attention they once gave their children. Care must be taken, however, that such relationships do not become too dependent or inhibit personal growth.

ADVICE: Don't give up your individual path. Spur yourself on to greater achievement. Don't get stuck in a pleasure trap. Seek liberation.

Made to Order

If this relationship is to endure it will need to build a successful organization, team or family tailored to satisfy personal needs, and particularly to tie its interests to those of the group. The structure of either the relationship or the organizations it fosters may not be especially well understood by those around it, who can view its methods as peculiar, its structure singular and its goals sometimes downright bizarre.

A Taurus I–Capricorn II team can be hard-driving and dynamic. One problem, however, is that Capricorn II's may be more interested in their own advancement or benefit than in that of the pair, so that they may jump ship at a crucial moment—and usually without any warning. Steady, devoted Taurus I's will find it harder to end the relationship, whether it manifests in the business, social or marital sphere.

Marriages, friendships and familial relationships in this combination may be quite ambitious in seeking social status in their community or circle. They highly prize money, prestige and power, considering them well worth whatever efforts are needed to attain them. Taurus I's may be a bit disturbed by the superaggressive, amoral approach of Capricorn II's, who in turn may see their Taurus I partner as a bit lazy or overly moral. A certain lack of emphasis on the human values of sympathy, kindness and affection may put the relationship in danger of becoming hard and unfeeling. Love affairs in this combination are often tough, sexually oriented confrontations in which the partners are not really prepared to give of themselves but tend to size each other up in terms of the profit they might gain from staying together.

If the relationship is a partnership in the business world, it will have to survive a lot of external criticism and lack of comprehension. It will have to develop good PR and emphasize its partners' unusual requirements. Should Taurus I's and Capricorn II's find these tasks fulfilling, they will go the extra mile to make their relationship capable of providing the top-notch goods or services that will satisfy the most demanding of customers.

ADVICE: Examine your motives. The ends may not justify the means. Develop your caring and affectionate side. Take the time to know people. Share feelings.

THE WEEK OF DOMINANCE
CAPRICORN III

Alone in a Crowd

Few individuals are as dominant as either of these two. One would not expect them even to form a friendship, then, let alone the most intimate of relationships. Yet the possibility exists in this combination for a true bond of the spirit, one that will set this relationship quite apart from others. These two can feel completely alone together in the middle of a crowded room. Perhaps some of the basis for their intimacy lies in the fact that these personalities, both highly ambitious, must actually understand each other quite well. So long as their spheres of influence don't clash, they may see in each other what each respects most, and this can become the basis for them to share their interior lives, which neither of them would do with someone they didn't admire. Furthermore, together they may find a more meaningful or socially responsible set of ideals to which to harness their ambition.

Even so, love affairs between these two can be quite difficult. Power struggles are likely to emerge constantly, particularly in purely sexual relationships. In a committed relationship or marriage, the partners should be sure to define their own unquestioned domains—otherwise their struggles may tear the relationship apart. But harmony will prevail if roles are well delineated and tasks defined, and the relationship's more positive aspects are more likely to unfold here, where there may exist a greater level of trust, empathy and understanding.

A family relationship will tie people together whether or not they choose it, so the question will become how these two can get along. Unfortunately they usually don't, and there is little to be done about it. Working on understanding, acceptance, thoughtfulness and ultimately love will be difficult when power plays are the order of the day, but if the relationship is to be productive rather than destructive, one partner will have to take the first step. A status quo, balance of power or truce is sometimes the best that can be hoped for, at least temporarily. At work, both individuals must control their immediate space, so it would make sense to place them in different departments.

ADVICE: Declare an armistice. Find areas in which conflict is not an issue. Promote mutual cooperation to achieve common goals. Be kind.

THE CUSP OF MYSTERY & IMAGINATION
CAPRICORN-AQUARIUS CUSP

Solving the Puzzle

These two have little in common. Their problem is how to reconcile manifestation and mystery, two very different concepts indeed. This pair's ongoing struggle will always be how to concretize the unfathomable and to spiritualize the concrete—in short, how to make sense of life while retaining one's awe of it; how to understand love in more than material terms yet express it in the real world; and how to approach abstract beauty closely enough to give it material form. These elusive goals can well keep this relationship together for quite some time, as each partner seeks what he or she lacks—rather like chasing butterflies.

The relationship will certainly be a safe haven for chaotic Capricorn-Aquarians to escape to, but it will also put them in touch with their dark side, either impelling them to understand it better or arousing worry and concern in both partners. Taurus I's, on the other hand, will be mesmerized by the relationship's more enigmatic aspects and will seek to unlock its puzzles. Thus the relationship will guide both partners toward inner psychological realms, the exploration of which will deepen their connection but also help them along their individual paths of self-realization.

In love, Taurus I's are likely to be attracted to the vibrancy of the Capricorn-Aquarius personality but will also gain satisfaction in being able to ground these exciting individuals in the physical plane, and to involve them in a relationship with a calming effect. Capricorn-Aquarians will appreciate the earthy sensuality of Taurus I's and will enjoy relaxing into a less frenetic relationship than they might ordinarily choose.

These two can prove an effective team as spouses or career partners, for both know how to work hard on a daily basis, and this relationship will bring out their more responsible side. They both have a strong tyrannical side, though, which can be magnified here, presenting grave problems for their children, employees or co-workers—and for each other.

ADVICE: Try to even out emotions. Avoid worry and brooding. Seek healthy outlets for your energies. Use your insights constructively.

Universal Questions

This relationship can exhibit a high level of mental activity, much of it aspiring not only to answer universal questions but also to deal with emotions on a basic human level. These two will find themselves grappling with issues of how to balance the absolute and the relative, the subjective and the objective, the ideal and the pragmatic. Both parties will benefit from such explorations but must beware of getting carried away and forgetting about more practical considerations. Taurus I's usually have both feet on the ground, but may be seduced away from that stance by the relationship's magnetic pull, so that they occasionally find themselves a bit lost or bewildered. Aquarius I's are on more familiar ground and will enjoy leading their Taurus I partner through intricate realms of thought.

In love affairs, Aquarius I's are likely to be either a bit cool or a bit eccentric for Taurus I tastes. Similarly, although the earthy sensuality of Taurus I's may intrigue Aquarius I's for a short while, it may in the longer run seem predictable and unimaginative to them. These partners do share a love of higher ideals and principles, however, which may lead them to continue their relationship in the platonic sphere, without heavy physical involvement, and to enjoy sharing affection and sympathy.

Marriages and friendships in this combination are probably the best bet; they will allow idealistic and emotional areas to be thoroughly explored without damaging feelings being aroused, at least not too often. Practical and abstract matters gel well here, providing a good balance in daily life. The relationship will be especially well suited for interaction with other friends or with children, for whom it may be a source of inspiration.

Work and family relationships will have obvious problems if the boss or parent is the Taurus I and the child or employee the Aquarius I: in very basic respects, the Taurus I will invariably try to change the Aquarius I, who will not react well to being controlled or forced into a mold and is likely to rebel against Taurus I rules and expectations, particularly in the area of repetitive daily tasks.

ADVICE: Don't get carried away. Tend to daily tasks. Keep your eye on the distant mountain but your feet on the ground. Balance your energies.

Languid Contentment

This relationship may well focus on a love of physical, sensuous beauty. The combination's hedonistic aspects are pronounced, most obviously in its partners' highly pleasurable interactions with each other and secondarily in a common love of the beautiful objects that bring joy to their lives. The danger here is that easy Aquarius II attitudes and the Taurus I love of repose may combine to give the relationship a somewhat lackadaisical, contented air, fostering laziness and procrastination. Indeed, the relationship may sometimes be so contented that it seems to lack any forward thrust and ambition.

In the work sphere, obviously, this can spell ruin, so this relationship is not recommended for co-workers or business partners. But friendships and love relationships in this combination can flourish and stand the test of time. Love affairs tend to be sensual rather than passionate, with the desire to please and be pleased being paramount. Drawbacks may include a lack of awareness or elevated consciousness, and a tendency to get mired down in the physical plane. Aquarius II's may pull back from the relationship for two reasons: one, a fear of getting too close to their Taurus I partner, and two, a need to be involved in more complex, troubled, even hurtful romantic pairings. Taurus I's may tend to back off when this side of their partner is revealed, but if they are deeply in love, or unduly attached to whatever the relationship gives them, pain is inevitable.

Taurus I–Aquarius II marriages can work out well, featuring a comfortable home life and an easy give-and-take in daily interactions. Children can benefit in this context, influenced by the prevailing harmony of their environment to develop the calmer side of their personalities. These marriages can last for life. If they are either or both spouses' second or third marriage, they may turn out to be the final one, and the happiest of all.

Catching a Butterfly

This rather puzzling combination defies easy definition. One senses something rather old and comfortable about it, yet it is also primarily concerned with all that is new and fresh, vulnerable and exciting. It is an action-oriented relationship—these two are likely to find themselves much on the move together. Exactly what they are moving toward will be the great question, since neither these personalities nor this relationship are comfortable with self-analysis: is all that movement a going-toward or a running-from?

Because the relationship is most at home in areas new, when these two are romantic partners one would expect them to have been involved in an earlier marriage, or in a string of exciting but ultimately unfulfilling love affairs, from which they approach each other with a feeling of "This is it." Whether that feeling is reasonable or advisable is open to question: too high an expectation of a love relationship is likely to backfire. Aquarius III's do not commit easily, and certainly not from the start, and their roving eye and, in early adulthood, their frequent inability to settle down will probably make their relationship with a Taurus I just one of many. Taurus I's, on the other hand, tend to commit and stay committed. Breakups are extremely difficult for them. Indeed a Taurus I holding onto an Aquarius III may refuse to let go—a futile exercise, like trying to catch a butterfly in a net with a hole in it.

Still, later in life, a Taurus I–Aquarius III marriage or close friendship can work out as a solution or compromise after earlier relationships have failed. Much water will have gone under the bridge by this time, and realistic choices are more likely. Aquarius III's will have learned to be more accepting and Taurus I's less easily upset, and less sensitive to disapproval. A boss-employee or parent-child relationship can be problematic in this combination. Taurus I's have a habit of putting on airs and pretending to be something they are not, and Aquarius III's need to poke holes in such balloons; Taurus I's also want to be well thought of, and the kind of derision that Aquarius III's can dish out will make them feel belittled and insecure, since they tend to react emotionally and are not as tough as they seem.

ADVICE: Accept relationships for what they are—no more, no less. Seek new approaches but don't neglect old methods. Beware of old, perhaps hidden, patterns.

The Merciless God of Perfection

This relationship is likely to want to sharpen skills and hone them to perfection. Its technical orientation in many ways complements the use of a strong outer persona or shell by both Taurus I's and Aquarius-Pisces to protect their inner sensitivity against the world. By emphasizing outward perfection, they can hide their emotional problems, but at the same time they run the risk of cutting themselves off from their deeper self. The danger in this relationship is that such attitudes will be mutually reinforcing, creating an environment that neglects or denies personal development and spiritual growth in the name of worldly success.

Love is one area where deeper emotions may be stirred. Because both parties tend to hide their feelings behind a wall, they may empathically share the sorrow of a lost childhood, and the grief of having sacrificed their hearts to the merciless god of perfection. The relationship carries the responsibility of reawakening such inner energies, a process that may be painful but can ultimately lead to joyful, even ecstatic expressions. Marriages too are favored in this combination, at least externally, for Taurus I–Aquarius-Pisces spouses will probably create an up-to-date household, full of modern conveniences and appliances to make work easier. Activities involving computers and the Internet, as well as other electronic equipment, are particularly emphasized. Unfortunately, personal emotions may be seen as messy in this technically advanced domestic sphere, and therefore may be suppressed.

Family members and friends in this combination generally share mutually satisfying interests or hobbies. Such relationships are not overly emotional, and may lack nurturing qualities, but may also be pervaded with gentle feeling and with sensitive consideration for personal matters. This relationship's coolness under fire can be especially beneficial to the groups of which it is a part.

Work relationships are highly favored here. Taurus I's and Aquarius-Pisces can make excellent co-workers or executive partners, leading their organization to heights of efficiency and effectiveness.

ADVICE: Don't neglect emotion or spirituality. Perfection may not be worth the price. Making errors and admitting them is only human. Relax.

Young Blood

Focusing on childlike innocence and spontaneity, this combination features direct expression and openness. Both partners have a strong devotional streak that their relationship blesses and enhances, so that service to families, social and religious groups and business organizations comes quite naturally here. In providing such services, these two must be careful not to be taken advantage of, and should insist on getting something substantial in return. No matter what their situation, however, they will exude freshness, fun and charm—all of which is bound to make them an extremely popular pair.

Marriages and love here may take time to stabilize. Pisces I's may even push for open arrangements that leave them free to roam, or to relate to several partners, and the relationship may seem to be able to handle this; but Taurus I's need security, and in such an arrangement they may painfully realize how much they need their partner's exclusive attentions. On the upside, Pisces I's are sure to bring some zest and life to Taurus I's, who will return the favor with their protection and support. Hopefully, Taurus I's will be sufficiently charmed by Pisces I's so as to overlook their tendency to ignore the practicalities of life, and matters having to do with the material world.

The relationship's youthful qualities will find full expression in friendships and families. This pair's humor, fun and banter will lighten the mood of any group. It should be noted, however, that their energies may easily run out of hand, making them forget or ignore pressing responsibilities. Other friends and family members may look to these two when they want to have a good time, but ignore them when there is serious work to be done.

Obviously this combination can be well suited to sharing responsibilities on the job. The pair's childlike quality, however, can make them sometimes overly dutiful to authority, or even overawed by it, and other times too rebellious against it. The development of maturity will be crucial, and the team will come into its own after several years of seasoned experience and working together. As a partnership in freelance endeavors, it will be financially astute and responsive to clients' needs, but may lack assertiveness in demanding what it feels it is worth.

ADVICE: Acknowledge mutual needs. Accept growing up as inevitable. Don't forget responsibilities. Force others to recognize your worth.

Closer Social Contact

Pisces II's have a great deal to learn from this relationship, which focuses on social interaction and can bring them from an isolated position into closer contact with their fellow human beings. Taurus I's will also benefit here, deepening their social skills and understanding people better, rather than just using them to implement their ideas. As a team, this duo will have a mutually beneficial connection with clubs, organizations and other social groups.

Pisces II's and Taurus I's may get along well enough in love, friendships and marriages but will find greatest fulfillment in their interactions with others, usually friends. The relationship is likely to find itself at the center of one or more groups of friends, associates or onlookers who are anxious to be associated with it. Such magnetic powers speak well for the harmony between these partners, but even more for the synergy they generate. Arranging finances and logistics for dinners, parties, trips and visits to clubs or theaters are particular specialties.

In the family, the relationship may occasion jealousy and anger from others who see it as a mutual-admiration society taking energy away from the group, and demanding too much attention. If these two are siblings, the offended family member may be a parent, another sibling or an uncle, aunt or cousin who resents the Taurus I–Pisces II relationship for taking the spotlight away from them.

Working relationships between these two may be weaker on the technical and practical side and stronger on humor, information-gathering and communication. Often the life of an office party, this matchup also lightens the load and greases the wheels on the job. Of course things can get too pleasurable in the middle of a project—this pair may sometimes find themselves rebuked and ordered to get back to work so that production quotas or deadlines can be met.

ADVICE: Don't neglect individual talents or self-expression. Concentrate more on self-improvement. Beware of arousing negative emotions.

PISCES III

A Steady Diet of Kudos

Energies here will focus on who will be the star. No matter what the outcome, however, this charismatic couple is likely to cut quite a swath in any society and should be aware that attention will tend to follow them wherever they go. They must take care, then, as to what they let others see. Open conflict is not unlikely here, and needs to be kept in check. In some ways these two can even bring out the worst in each other, since any natural empathy or sympathy they have for others tends to fall by the wayside in their frolics.

Pisces III's are definitely drawn to the spotlight, and Taurus I's will not tolerate being shoved out of it for long themselves. As a result, their combination is apt to create a kind of unattractive competitiveness between them, which can lead to all sorts of conflicts if it runs out of control. Perhaps the key here is that the partners need to appreciate each other's talents, regularly supplying the kudos necessary to support each other's egos. Considering the feelings of other people should also be a priority. Another possible solution appears when the relationship itself attracts attention and is admired as an entity in itself, thus satisfying its partners' pride.

Marriage and love here will demand that the partners take an equal interest in each other: perhaps Pisces III's will admire Taurus I's for their practical abilities, Taurus I's Pisces III's for their imaginations. Being ignored or neglected is the worst punishment that can be dished out here, and unfortunately these two often use neglect as a weapon in their struggles with one another. Should the necessary attention be paid, however, nothing short of outright rejection or infidelity is likely to be powerful enough to split up the relationship.

In work and in friendship, Taurus I's and Pisces III's may form a mutual-admiration society. The danger here is that the partners may be so satisfied with the attention they receive from each other that they turn their back on both their own self-development and on other co-workers and friends. In family relationships, especially parent-child combinations, parents of either sign can project their own frustrated dreams and desires on their children, resulting in a big push to make them stars.

ADVICE: Stop the competition. Work on self-development. Don't ignore others. Being admired isn't always productive. Eliminating ego needs leaves you freer.

A Real Education

Frequent themes here, not surprisingly, will be learning and education. Since Taurus II's are not only good teachers but good students, this relationship may place one of the partners in the former role and the other in the latter. These roles may quickly reverse: Taurus II parents, aunts or uncles may see themselves as mentors to a Taurus II child until one day it becomes obvious that they are ones who are actually learning most in this relationship. These two can be expected to share an enthusiasm for physical activities as well as for mental ones.

Love relationships and friendships between these two may not be successful. Taurus II's are usually drawn to those unlike themselves, taking a special (but not exclusive) interest in anyone they consider disadvantaged; they are likely to be bored with someone resembling them, such as another Taurus II. Should they proceed to marry, the results can be quite productive: nurturing qualities are high here, favoring not only children but pets and gardening, and the marriage is also likely to include a deep interest in intellectual, aesthetic and creative activities (notably dance and music). But it is also likely to have a critical, at times irritating tone. Domestic responsibilities may have to be carefully shared and assigned, for Taurus II's are rarely much interested in housework. And although they are loving to their offspring, their highly moral side is accentuated here, resulting at times in overly strict rules and attitudes that may inadvertently inculcate guilt and shame in young ones. The frictions of a marriage like this one can escalate into open warfare, and once such conflicts erupt, their aftermath may trouble the landscape of the relationship for weeks or even months. There is, however, an arena in which these aggressive feelings can often be worked out: the bedroom. Both partners are equally frank and open in their approach to sex. Taurus II entrepreneurial and organizational skills can make this relationship indispensable to a business or family project. Once such a project is finished, however, it should not be assumed that these two efficient individuals can continue to work together harmoniously.

ADVICE: Ease up in your criticism. Teaching and learning are two sides of the same coin. Don't point the blame. Be ethical and moral but not overly so. Lessen tensions.

Crazy Love

These two partners carry strong earth energy (Taurus is an earth sign), signifying the world of sensation, practicality and groundedness. Yet their relationship is characterized by feelings. Together, they are apt to feel and express a depth and a range of emotion that may affect them profoundly. The gamut of feelings that can emerge here, in fact, may even confuse them, particularly when a more negative part of the spectrum, such as competitiveness or jealousy, is dominant. Luckily, this darker, more brooding aspect is offset by this pair's ability to have fun and to enjoy all forms of entertainment. Charm is never lacking here, and magnetism runs high.

The most successful friendships and family relationships (especially between siblings) in this combination are those in which mature attitudes prevail and thoughtfulness and consideration are not considered antithetical to pleasure. While these two are apt to have a great deal of fun together, they may invite guilt if they have come to feel they have escaped responsibilities by dumping them elsewhere.

In love affairs, the spontaneous and uninhibited aspects of the Taurus III character often bring out the similar, more natural side of Taurus II's, resulting in an often riotous or zany relationship that can be not only great fun but also emotionally meaningful, while it lasts. The extreme need of Taurus III's for freedom and independence is well matched by Taurus II's refusal to place heavy demands on them, while Taurus II's for their part will appreciate being left alone and not fussed over. Marriages may be less successful, due to a lack of stabilizing factors. Yet the combination is deeply sympathetic and compassionate, leaving its partners free to express deep emotion and discuss their differences openly, meeting acceptance rather than condemnation. Physically, this can be a satisfying, natural and sensuous partnership.

Working relationships between these two can work out well, particularly with a Taurus II boss who is comfortable when employees have a good time in the workplace, and who fulfills obligations because of a free wish to do so, rather than a requirement. Taurus III's are extremely comfortable with such attitudes.

ADVICE: Try to balance enthusiastic and critical attitudes. Have fun, but take responsibility daily. Continue to explore emotional areas.

THE CUSP OF ENERGY

Earning the Right to Express

Although this relationship focuses on being natural and relaxed, its underlying mood is less free and easy than one would expect. In fact, the right to express oneself openly in this pairing must be earned rather than taken for granted. Critical and demanding attitudes may prevail unless given a periodic airing, and irritations and resentments, if ignored or suppressed, can surface in unpleasant and unexpected ways. One partner's condemnation of the other's irresponsibility can be a frequent occurrence here. Similarly, a suspicion of ostentation and ego usually requires these two to be more muted in their behavior. It isn't necessarily that certain behavior invariably causes shame or blame, but rather that the relationship calls for a kind of dignity.

In love and marriage, Taurus-Gemini's high-strung and frenetic pace is unlikely to provide the sense of security that Taurus II's need. Particularly in marriage, the efforts of the Taurus II to bring stability to the relationship can be undercut by the Taurus-Gemini's inability to be tied down to a single partner. On the other hand, especially in love affairs, the frank and critical attitudes of Taurus II's can arouse quite a bit of insecurity in a Taurus-Gemini who may be hopelessly in love.

Friendships between these two are likely to be the best manifestation of this combination. A failed marriage or love affair may quite possibly settle into a friendship, perhaps suggesting that it would have been better this way from the start. An air of appreciation, admiration and mutual acceptance is likely to prevail here.

Family relationships, particularly father-daughter or mother-son, can be stormy but rewarding. The parent and child usually like each other, but find it difficult to get close; they even keep at a certain physical distance from each other, avoiding overt displays of affection, although affection is actually a strong need here, unfortunately often an elusive and frustrating one. Siblings with this matchup are likely to generate conflicting energies that will disrupt daily family life. Some types of work arrangement in this combination can work out well. Boss-employee relationships tend to be successful if Taurus II's are at the helm.

ADVICE: Be more open about feelings. Needs can be discussed even if they are not expressed. Build respect and cultivate affection. Beware of double standards.

Push Me, Pull You

This volatile relationship is alternately magnetic and rebellious: its partners are drawn to each other yet repelled at the same time. Some form of wildness is unleashed as soon as they come too close, forcing a kind of distancing to achieve equilibrium again. Judgmental attitudes are often used to achieve this goal. As a result, true closeness is elusive here and may not exist at all except in brief moments.

When these two become involved, the didactic, even pedantic tone of Taurus II's often comes out, making Gemini I's recoil, rebel and flee. They can be attracted, though, by their similar views on justice and morality, and may do best together when fighting side by side for the same cause.

In love affairs, Gemini I free-spiritedness may at first be very attractive to a Taurus II but may eventually be perceived as wild ways that must be controlled or rejected. Taurus II's ultimately demand a devotion and a stability that Gemini I's are usually unable to give. Furthermore, although Gemini I's are often seductive and physically exciting individuals, when rejected by a Taurus II they may come unglued, indulging in undignified and in extreme cases pitiful behavior. Both marriages and friendships have the best chance of success when directed outward to shared activities. The biggest problem here is usually that Taurus II's will have little patience with Gemini I addictions, and will begin looking for the exit as soon as they first surface.

In family and working relationships (the latter being more productive), Taurus II parents and bosses are likely to be much more permissive toward Gemini I children and employees than vice versa. As parents, however, both of these personalities will periodically direct condemning moral attitudes at their children, which may cause bewilderment, since the overall approach is usually fairly easy. As for the offspring or employees, again of either of these weeks of the year, they are likely to break into rebellion at the first hint of tyrannical or unfair treatment, laying the responsibility on the authority figure to explain him- or herself and to avoid sending mixed signals, laying on guilt trips or indulging in other forms of ambivalent behavior.

ADVICE: Never compromise your own or another's dignity. Examine your feelings. Be honest. Don't be afraid of rejection. Don't take too much for granted.

Mountain Updrafts

This relationship can be active, versatile, many-sided and emotionally complex. Energy is the focus here, ebbing and flowing in fierce countercurrents and swirls of intensity. Earth and air energies, betokening sensation and thought, are dramatic, like mountain updrafts, with immediate reactions to external stimuli coalescing powerfully with the later, more objective examination of these reactions. These two individuals have marked effects on each other, influencing the most important areas of each other's lives—even without necessarily spending much clock time together, or even having that much to do with each other for long periods.

Even in the closest relationships in this combination, like love, friendship and marriage (which in some cases here overlap or are indistinguishable), these two sometimes spend more time with a third or fourth party known to both of them than they do with each other. The more destructive, dark-side attractions of Gemini II's and the Taurus II sympathy for the underdog and for the disadvantaged often play a complicating part here. Such triangles and quartets are likely to be as important and at least as strong as the Taurus II–Gemini II relationship itself. In situations like these, sharing thoughts and feelings, communicating honestly and building organizations (whether social, financial, artistic or athletic) are ever-present issues—as are dealing with jealousy, competitiveness, covetousness and resentment. The relationship will have to have the flexibility to adapt psychologically and physically to the larger group of which it forms a part. Marriages that go through such fire together and emerge intact often last for life.

Working relationships between these two are unlikely to gel, since both partners operate better on their own, with full freedom of movement and above all the right to make their own decisions. In the family, where members are bound together willy-nilly, many years will be needed for these two to adapt to each other. Gemini II intolerance and Taurus II stubbornness may be a constant source of grievances.

ADVICE: Don't lose sight of what's most important. Keep your head together. Intense feeling is no guarantee of permanence—on the contrary.

THE WEEK OF THE SEEKER
GEMINI III

A Truth Test

The focus of this relationship is independence, a need that Gemini III's must learn to express to a Taurus II partner and must teach and bring out in the Taurus II as well. Unfortunately, Taurus II's have a demanding degree of anger and possessiveness. The relationship may in fact become a good testing ground for the development of accepting and nonclaiming attitudes, a kind of truth test that both partners will eventually have to take.

In career, family and marriage, Gemini III's have problems binding themselves to a group. Taurus II's, who are seriously involved in such matters, will find it difficult to work with these elusive partners. An alternative, however, especially if children are not involved, is for the Taurus II to join the Gemini III in a relationship based on adventure, travel and other forms of investigation, exploration and learning. Here the theme of independence can refer to the relationship itself, rather than to its two members. Another possibility is for the Gemini III to function within a Taurus II-led company or organization as a financially astute free agent or adviser who has a lot of latitude in determining his or her schedule and deciding how responsibilities are to be fulfilled.

Love relationships here are likely to be exciting but ultimately unfulfilling, especially if of the conventional sort. But Gemini III's who have felt a need for variety in an already established relationship may seek out a more physical and attractive Taurus II with whom to have a fling, or even a long-standing affair. In secret relationships like these, Taurus II's may come to have quite protective feelings toward Gemini III's, convinced that they can give them the love, understanding and passion that they are denied in their primary relationship.

Highly independent friendships with few responsibilities can be successful here. The sharing of challenging activities can push the capabilities of both partners to the limit.

ADVICE: Be as honest as you can. Commit to a single course of action occasionally. Be adventuresome but not foolhardy. Realize your common interest.

THE CUSP OF MAGIC

White Noise

The emotional channels between these two are often clogged with static and missed connections. One can expect communication problems to abound between them. In fact they sometimes do better by not talking at all, abiding by each other in silence. A setup like this could well suit these two, both of whom hold privacy very dear. The inability to connect more meaningfully has an unfortunate side effect, however: the pair tend to leave a string of unfinished projects behind them.

Irritating elements abound in this relationship, especially in the area of romance. Taurus II's are much too matter-of-fact about physical matters to satisfy the Gemini-Cancer need for sensitivity and privacy. Furthermore, they are little interested in providing the kind of sympathy and gentle understanding that Gemini-Cancers require, regarding it not just as a nuisance but as a kind of soft coddling of which they don't really approve. Love affairs and marriages are likely to be problematic between these two. Friendships may succeed if they grant the maximum amount of freedom to each partner. But the question then becomes: is there anything binding these two together, anything to make a relationship possible or desirable at all? Chances are best if a shared pursuit can be found, one that is practical and down-to-earth yet that does not require daily attention (unlike gardening or caring for pets). Often an interest in art, movies, music or sports may fit the bill well.

Family relationships here are complex. Gemini-Cancer parents are capable of providing secure and loving homes for Taurus II children, who, however, may find this kind of context exactly what they dislike. Taurus II children are difficult to get close to emotionally, particularly when growing up. On the other hand, Taurus II parents of Gemini-Cancer children are likely to give them so much latitude (or, as the Taurus II's see it, so much responsibility) that they come to resent it, recalling it later in life as neglect or disinterest. As co-workers in a company or freelance project, these two may meet with a certain amount of success, but eventually their different emotional and ethical orientations may prove divisive.

ADVICE: Find a common basis for sharing. Learn to compromise and to empathize. See the other person's point of view. Speak openly.

Fertile Ground

Traditional rules of conduct will never govern this relationship, which will want to develop its own value system. In some ways this will give it a great deal of integrity. Indeed, the combination is likely to have an originality and an honorableness that both its partners value and even idealize, helping to make it quite long-lasting.

Both marriages and love affairs in this combination are apt to flourish. An appreciation is felt here for out-of-the-way people, places and things, resulting, for example, in unusual objects decorating the living space, and in friendships with other couples who elsewhere are not always appreciated or understood. The Taurus II need to nurture and protect those whom the world has treated badly surfaces in this relationship. The Cancer I, meanwhile, will enjoy trying to make the Taurus II's life more comfortable and secure, especially through the energy invested in the home base. Given this relationship's full palette of emotional expression, sympathy, kindness, love and understanding will probably find fertile ground here.

Good feelings are likely to dominate in friendships of this combination, and a common appreciation of hidden byways of life, whether in the realms of psychology, art and music, or nature, may become the basis for a strong bond. Care will have to be taken in the emotional sphere, however, for jealousy and feelings of rejection are likely to appear periodically, particularly where attentions to a third party are concerned. In the family, parents, grandparents, aunts and uncles of either sign tend to have highly protective relationships with children of the other sign. Should these close bonds overlap with a period of great stress and need in the lives of one of the partners, they will prove highly comforting. Working relationships here are less strongly recommended, since Taurus II's may need more independence than their more organizationally oriented Cancer I partners want to countenance. Furthermore, differing views on the handling of finances and the structuring of business, coupled with occasional arguments and breakdowns in communication, may make collaboration difficult.

ADVICE: Try to discuss differences without arguing. Ordinary matters need your attention too. Don't reject conservative views out of hand. Stay open.

Mutual Fascination

The thrust of this relationship may be breaking through barriers to communication and opening up common avenues of expression. There may be an intense curiosity in uncovering hidden and perhaps unappreciated aspects of the other partner—in coming close, studying, learning, and above all understanding. Both of these people have an unusually strong need to express their points of view; here is a relationship geared specifically to just that. Taurus II's have much to teach Cancer II's, but also much to learn from them about how to be oneself without compromising one's individuality in the face of society's pressures, or enslaving oneself to the demands of work, school or family. Indeed pride in individuality may emerge as an important theme here.

Taurus II–Cancer II love affairs can be deep and passionate. Taurus II's have a deep weakness for unconventional Cancer II's and can give themselves here without reservation. They will encourage Cancer II's to reveal their more hidden or unconventional side within the safety of this relationship. Cancer II's may see Taurus II's as a bit staid or even dull in certain respects but will appreciate their enthusiasm for learning about unusual subjects and activities. They could well teach Taurus II's how to lighten up and laugh, especially by looking at the humor in the bizarre, and they will also enjoy Taurus II stability and security. In all these ways the relationship might be ideal for both partners.

Friendships between these two are likely to be exclusive affairs, oriented more inward, toward the partners themselves, than outward, as a unit interacting with others. Hours may be spent together in mutually fascinated discussion of each other's different ways of being, and of not only daily experiences but occasionally miraculous or even psychic ones. A danger exists here of becoming isolated and cut off from the world. For similar reasons, working and family relationships in this combination are likely to work against the good of the group; this pair's preoccupation with private matters will not be conducive to success.

ADVICE: Beware of destructive and antisocial tendencies. Maintain objectivity. If swept away, remember you also have to come back. Follow both head and heart.

Expansive Gestures

Grand projects, far-reaching ideas and expansive gestures are the stuff of this relationship. Stinginess and pettiness are seen as downers here and are despised; the relationship galvanizes the more magnanimous side of both these personalities. With each other, they are more likely to give than to share, and as a unit relating to others they are likely to take the generous attitude that money given is a gift, while money paid back has been redefined as a loan. These two can be expected to be found working together toward a greater goal and in areas of social conscience.

Unconditional giving can have its drawbacks, however, particularly if it puts the pair at the mercy of spongers. As a marriage or friendship, in fact, this relationship will probably have to become a bit tougher in its dealing with the outside world if it is to avoid being taken advantage of, for even this giving couple will reach their limits sooner or later. There is also a pronounced tendency to bring other people into the relationship, a habit of openness to others that may often threaten the primary bond itself.

Taurus II–Cancer III love affairs may be passionate at first, but in romance Cancer III's are rarely able to follow their heart, since they have probably already given it to their cause or profession. Acute differences in needs and wants may also make this relationship difficult in the long term: Cancer III's may come to resent the didactic streak in Taurus II's, while Taurus II's may become critical of Cancer III ambition.

At work, these two make a powerful team, particularly as business partners or co-workers engaged in getting new projects off the ground. They are less successful as a boss-employee pair. Projects involving long-distance transportation, mammoth machinery (real, structural or on paper) or high-flying corporations are especially favored. In the family, this pair is likely to push too hard and too fast. Ambitious attitudes are likely to lead the family to overextend itself, especially in the financial sphere, with disastrous results.

ADVICE: One step at a time. First things first. Some gifts imply expectations; love should not be one of them. Beware of parasites.

Bettering Past Records

Although Taurus II's are governed by the earth element (Taurus is an earth sign) and Cancer-Leos by water and fire (Cancer is a water sign, Leo is fire), it is the fourth element, air (symbolizing thought), that rules this relationship. Seeking excitement and adventure, or perhaps trying to better past records or aspiring toward philosophical or spiritual goals, all come naturally here. Stability can be a problem, but financial success in several endeavors, if handled wisely over time, can often yield the necessary support.

Friendships and love relationships can thrive here so long as they not only guarantee their partners' freedom of thought and action but also direct the pair as an independent unit with shared aspirations. What is ultimately of greatest importance in the relationship is for Taurus II's its educational value, for Cancer-Leos the thrill of achievement. Planning endeavors, discussing their merits, making choices and, after the fact, evaluating and reorganizing for new onslaughts are specialties of this combination. The hard-headed, practical side of the Taurus II will coalesce with the intuitive and feeling sides of the Cancer-Leo, synergistically producing mental and communicative energy. Problems can arise, however, if too much intellectualization, ideation or fantasy about an experience supplants the experience itself.

Marriages in this combination can be highly successful, full of interesting and challenging activities. They thrive on problems, although care should be taken not to create unnecessary ones, or to fall into not completely involuntary patterns of cycles of disaster and salvation. These two may or may not include their children in their activities, but in either case may neglect a child's deep need for security.

Sibling relationships in this combination are apt to be competitive, but productively so, inspiring the partners to new achievements. Parent-child relationships, however, may suffer from conflicting energies and interests. The success of working relationships will depend on whether temperamental differences can be reconciled and negative emotions controlled or constructively redirected.

ADVICE: Don't get carried away. Try to stay realistic. Stability will help you achieve your goals. Guard against negative expectations.

Told You So

This relationship often centers around using existing knowledge to look toward and predict the future. Even when these partners have strong hunches about how things will turn out, they inevitably look to some source to back up what they think. The relationship's conflicts and arguments, then, are likely to focus on who is right, who was right the last time, and who will be right in the future. Should both partners be able to agree on an unimpeachable source of authority, they are likely to wield it as a club against other individuals and couples.

Taurus II–Leo I marriages can grow out of friendships, love affairs, or both. The point is that moving toward marriage is often an evolutionary process for these two and can conceivably stop at any point along the way. Not infrequently, a school or other institution of learning is their first meeting ground—they may well be two students, two teachers, or a teacher-student pair. In this context, arguments and disagreements over knowledge and information are virtually inevitable between them, with one challenging the other to prove the reliability of a source or reference, say. The satisfaction of the I-told-you-so attitude will also appear more innocuously in playful or humorous bets over how an event will turn out.

As friends, Taurus II's and Leo I's are magnetically attracted to each other, especially when of the same sex. Friendships here are likely to be close. Yet there is also usually some big difference between these two, perhaps of stature, background or ideology, that belies or obscures their empathic bond, so that other people may mistakenly assume they are not at all intimate. A pet peeve here is when others make prejudicial assumptions and statements, particularly of a racist or sexist nature. When this button is pushed, the pair are likely to withdraw in distaste, or else go quickly into the attack mode. Family and working relationships in this combination often manifest a lot of friction, with fighting over who is right and condemnatory finger-pointing over who is wrong. Struggles over which person is to be the boss or authority figure are bound to be severe.

ADVICE: Agree not to disagree too openly—others may not like watching you fight. Be tolerant and open to new ideas. Give up know-it-all attitudes.

Dedicated Devotion

Because these two are square to each other in the zodiac (90° apart), conventional astrology predicts frictions, problems and conflict between them, and indeed both of these fixed signs—Taurus, an earth sign, and Leo, a fire sign—are opinionated and stubborn. Actually, however, the Taurus II and Leo II personalities blend exceedingly well: both are no-nonsense individuals, with a heartfelt empathy for all less fortunate than they. Their relationship also reinforces this latter characteristic, emphasizing devotion and dedication, and softens the former one, allowing these two to be more inspirational and romantic than they usually are.

Magic is an important theme here: loves and friendships share a gentle, sensuous quality with a strong romantic overlay. These two may wander hand-in-hand through many an enchanted land, but both partners are responsible enough to live up to their part of the deal, and they don't see trustworthiness and reliability as antithetical to love—on the contrary, in fact, these qualities generate good feelings, actually contributing to romance. The relationship has a certain pride in itself, then, which appears to others as a kind of glow radiating in its partners' shy smiles.

Marriages are less strongly recommended, for much of the relationship's enchantment is dissipated in the sometimes humdrum continuity of everyday life. The partners may later express regret that they tried to solidify and give social meaning or structure to a combination once so natural and unassuming. Unfortunately, Taurus II's and Leo II's are usually unable to give a marriage the same kind of incandescence that characterized their love affair, no matter how hard they try.

Family relationships are likely to be affectionate and supportive, particularly between siblings of the same sex. Occasional explosions and stubborn confrontations may be inevitable, but they clear the air, and indicate the partners' honesty. A working relationship may be a bit mundane for these two unless it is devoted to a social cause, or to aiding the disenfranchised, in which case they would make an inspired and unusually successful team.

ADVICE: Romance isn't always necessary. Learn how to work together effectively on an everyday basis. Explore imaginative endeavors.

TAURUS II

August 11–18

THE WEEK OF LEADERSHIP
LEO III

A Difference in Attitude

Struggles for power will tend to surface in this relationship. The reason behind many of these confrontations may be found in a difference in attitude: Leo III's are born leaders to whom achieving results and driving toward well-defined goals matter deeply, and although honor can be important to them, it is most often only as an expression of their inflated egos. Taurus II's, on the other hand, care about motives and ultimately about right and wrong. Thus Taurus II morality (how one gets somewhere counts) conflicts with Leo III aggressiveness (the fact that one gets somewhere counts). Particularly at work and in the family, these contradictory viewpoints can cause severe problems. Should these two be able to find a way to work together, however, they can have a considerable hand in shaping the future, perhaps becoming the authorities at the forefront of a field of endeavor.

Friendships and love affairs have a possibility of success—they are kinds of relationship in which this combination is likely to be able to avoid power struggles. Judgmental attitudes tend to be more relaxed, and combative levels lower or nonexistent a good deal of the time. Both partners take pride in the relationship's warmth of feeling, which, in the case of love affairs, may smolder for many years with unabated intensity.

Marital matchups encourage Taurus II dependence on Leo III's, who usually take the lead and like to give support to their mates and children. Should they fail to live up to their promises, however, or fall victim to their own hubris, Taurus II's are likely to take a dim view of them, especially if they also experience some kind of breakdown. Taurus II's require dignity above all in a mate, and a Leo III whose dignity is lost can be a pitiful sight.

Parental relationships are likely to be problematic here: in either parent-child combination, ethical Taurus II's are likely to judge Leo III actions rather harshly. And if Leo III's are the parents, they will have a tendency to spoil their children, a treatment Taurus II's actually tend to resent. At work, boss-employee pairs in either permutation of this combination often encounter power struggles over what the employee perceives as unfair treatment from the boss.

ADVICE: Try to be more accepting and less judgmental. Enjoy yourself without reservations. Be more compassionate. Put yourself in the other's place.

A Sacred Trust

The strongly sympathetic and understanding attitudes that appear in this relationship give it an atmosphere of trust. Private matters can be kept that way without threat of revelation. The downside of this is a heightened sensitivity to betrayals of confidence in any form, so that as trusting as it is, the relationship simultaneously contains a suspicious undertone; for the most part, however, confidences will be regarded as sacred and honored completely, and these two together will be trusted by others. This in turn allows them to persuade, teach and lead in whatever field suits them.

Whether or not Taurus II's and Leo-Virgos have interests in common at the start of their relationship, they will develop areas of sharing, pleasure and growth in their everyday life. In most respects this is a healthy bond, but certain tendencies will have to be monitored carefully, notably those leading to excessive privatization of feelings and consequent isolation from social interaction. Widening the circle of friendship to include others is essential here, not only to enrich the primary relationship itself but to learn the lesson of sharing in a wider social and universal sense. Friendships are particularly favored in this combination.

Love affairs, although understanding, may fail to ignite flames of passion or touch deeper layers of emotion. Marriages may not be that successful either, partly because Taurus II's need to nurture and Leo-Virgos have difficulties doing so. Having children is not recommended here, for Leo-Virgos tend to make their own needs paramount, and demand preponderant attention. Family relationships are likely to be close, replete with temperamental displays, especially with opposite-sex siblings. The profound emotions felt here may well continue into adulthood, even in some cases resulting in the siblings inhabiting contiguous living spaces.

Work relationships can succeed if the partners maintain a strict objectivity on the job at hand. They can be quite successful in any sales endeavor so long as it does not conflict with their personal ideals.

ADVICE: Build bridges to the world. Secretiveness may arouse suspicions. Try to be more open. Remember your responsibilities to others.

Serious Sacrifices

This relationship will push its partners to have the guts and determination to achieve well-defined and perhaps much-longed-for goals instead of sitting back and relaxing. The relationship's seriousness is reflected in the sacrifices that the partners are willing to make, often doing without for months and years so that ultimately they will get what they want and be where they want to be. This dedication implies tremendous unity of purpose. It also demands that channels of communication remain open so that counterproductive misunderstandings can be quickly rectified.

Virgo I's have a need for relatively unserious involvements that will let them loosen up and have fun. In love and marriage, then, their relationships with Taurus II's may be crippled by what they see as excessive rules, structures and moral imperatives that stand in the way of easy give-and-take. Tensions on both sides, then, may make enjoyment of the rewards of all the pair's hard work and dedication difficult or impossible. Although a Virgo I's choice of this particular mate may in many respects be realistic, the Taurus II may not respond with enough passion, and if this arouses the Virgo I's insecurities (feelings of being unattractive or unworthy, say), withdrawal and anxiety are likely to result.

This relationship is successful in the work sphere, and also in families in which a Taurus II–Virgo I parent-child combination runs a business or service together. Achieving short-term goals—perhaps arranging for loans, building new work space, getting clients, reorganizing bookkeeping, doing inventory and the like—will build the confidence these two need to keep moving toward their long-term objectives. Friendships here can also be an extremely positive career influence, inspiring each partner on in their respective fields. A professionally successful partner can serve as a role model for the other, especially when parental influences in childhood have been less than ideal or outright destructive.

ADVICE: Relax enough to enjoy the fruits of your labor. Have fun. Aim for attainable short-range goals. Cultivate romantic settings.

THE WEEK OF THE ENIGMA
VIRGO II

In the Face of Tradition

Unconventional is probably the best word to define this relationship, which tends to fly in the face of tradition and to oppose the expectations and wishes of friends and family members. To top it off, this duo will go one step farther by criticizing or harshly judging people with more traditional views. Born in the Week of the Enigma, Virgo II's are unusual, secretive individuals who are hard to get to know—exactly the kind of person to whom Taurus II's are often attracted. For their part, Taurus II's can breach Virgo II defenses with an irresistible combination of aggressiveness and charm.

Love affairs between these two are highly meaningful, often featuring a complex, pleasurable and non-traditional approach to love and lovemaking. The frank and honest Taurus II approach to sex, often eschewing sympathy and at times even romance, gels well with the Virgo II dislike of sopiness and sentimentality. When the relationship allows the carnal side of Taurus II's to predominate over the priggish, new heights of passion and inventiveness can be reached. This is not to say that the relationship necessarily stirs the inner depths of the Virgo II, or even reaches them, but continued intimate trust of a Taurus II love partner can introduce deeper levels of revelation and emotional involvement. Marriages are a distinct possibility, then, but one or both partners may have an aversion to tying the knot, preferring the freer atmosphere of living together.

Friendships can likewise be a first step toward closer sharing and trust, but these two don't always get that far. The trine aspect here (Taurus II and Virgo II are 120° apart in the zodiac) means that at least on a superficial level there is usually a comfortable rapport, so that co-worker acquaintanceships or companionships can emerge easily; but they may not lead to long-lasting friendships. As a work team, this pair can prove quite innovative, finding new ways to accomplish goals and achieve success. Family relationships usually feature a lack of understanding, with sharp critical attacks followed by withdrawal or silence.

ADVICE: Keep bonds of trust intact. Work on emotional honesty to reach deeper levels of communication. Fighting conventional attitudes may be a waste of time and energy.

THE WEEK OF THE LITERALIST
VIRGO III

Determined to Succeed

The mutually hard-headed energies of Taurus II's and Virgo III's often collide in the form of struggles for dominance, but may also coalesce synergistically in a relationship that is dedicated and determined to succeed, whether in business or at home. The relationship may in fact become the linchpin, or at least an important bulwark, of a successful company or family. The determining factor here will often be whether these two like each other, pure and simple. They do share many qualities, such as a hatred of pretense and phoniness and an insistence on fairness, especially to the disadvantaged. This is no antidote, however, for their struggles for supremacy.

Personal relationships such as marriages, love affairs and friendships are likely to evidence the most conflict, alternating, however, with warm and caring expressions of emotion. Taurus II–Virgo III love affairs may prove highly pleasurable, but feelings tend to run deeper when one or both of the parties already has a primary relationship elsewhere. Generally speaking, opposing the tenets of society, and the dominance of the other partner, comes naturally to this relationship. These two will have no hesitation about flaunting their passions dramatically, feeling no need for secrecy or sneakiness.

Conflicts in marriages of this combination bring both positive and negative results. The relationship is often toughened and strengthened by honest discussion and even argument, the emotional element in these confrontations being quickly forgotten. Communication is a strength; the pair will be objective, hearing the other point of view clearly and responding logically, albeit with feeling. They are also responsible in their attitudes to domestic matters and children—as long as both partners keep up their end of the deal, without being forced to by destructive power struggles. Friendships here can be easy but a bit superficial. They are rarely of primary importance to their partners, who may not spend that much time together. Often respectful of each other's powers and talents, these two function best as siblings within a family, or as co-workers or partners on the job.

ADVICE: Be aware of people's feelings. Don't succumb to power urges. Beware of ruthlessness. Never compromise the dignity or values of others.

THE CUSP OF BEAUTY
VIRGO-LIBRA CUSP

Influencing Tastes

This relationship is likely to involve attempts to influence tastes and aesthetic views, not only those of the partners themselves but also those of others, be they individual or corporate. There are ambivalent feelings here, particularly in social issues and in matters of style. Part of the relationship's running commentary has to do with a split in the attitudes of Taurus II's: on the one hand, they are extremely interested in everything up-to-date, stylish and aesthetic; on the other, they hate snobbism, putting on airs and all forms of elitism, which of course abound in the worlds of fashion and art. Virgo-Libra attitudes, meanwhile, are for the most part unequivocally elitist, and the sensibility is highly refined.

Friendship and love between these two can be squarely based on physical attraction, and will feature seductive, often sensual forms of persuasion. In the interest of preserving harmony and good feeling, important issues that should actually be thrashed out may instead be avoided. Differences in fundamental value structures make Taurus II–Virgo-Libra marriages problematic: the Virgo-Libra's more superficial nature and social aspirations may prove unacceptable to the Taurus II, who will eventually come to judge his or her partner rather harshly.

Resentments and conflicts are less likely to surface in the office, or in freelance work. Should their business deal directly with matters of style or fashion, their unanimity may be total. Should the work be more personal, however, such as a restaurant, small store or other occupation in which one's public appearance can be freer or more casual, Taurus II's and Virgo-Libras will spend a lot of time debating this issue, each trying to persuade the other of their point of view. Should they come to an aesthetic agreement, they could generate enormous success by persuading others to follow their lead. Marketing is a forte here. In parent-child relationships in this combination, generational differences will lead to different approaches, but rather than arguing or attempting to intimidate, the partners will use more subtle forms of manipulation to convince each other.

ADVICE: Let others make up their own minds. Try to find a solid basis for your life. Don't be blown about by the winds of change. Seek lasting values.

THE WEEK OF THE TEACHER
TAURUS II

September 25–October 2

THE WEEK OF THE PERFECTIONIST
LIBRA I

Balmy Midwinter's Day

Incisive thought is the primary theme here, leading to colorful and vibrant interactions and ideas. Critical and dominating aspects also feature strongly, so that stability is a little low: too often, worry and concern about doing the wrong thing will undermine the relationship's security, leading to judgmental or blaming attitudes that undercut any pleasure. One of those relationships that may not last long, like a balmy mid-winter's day, this pairing should nevertheless be thoroughly enjoyed without too much reflection.

Love affairs between these two can be highly satisfying, especially in the sexual sphere, where each partner will be excited by the other's physical attractiveness. Combining with the relationship's emphasis on the mental, this physical connection may give the relationship an obsessive quality, reducing conscious control and heightening the pain of any separation or breakup. The mental motor can be turned off, however, by total involvement in some absorbing but not necessarily intellectual area—work, domestic affairs, money-making or management activities.

Both Taurus II's and Libra I's are highly critical, and their business and marital partnerships tend to be somewhat unsettled and irregular. Things may go well for a while, but storm clouds will inevitably gather and lightning will flash. This duo risks running away from pressing problems, a habit that, particularly in marriage, may reflect a refusal to confront emotions and be honest about them (a notable trait of Libra I's). Taurus II partners may experience some frustration at being unable to reach Libra I's at a deep level, but with patience, over time, the relationship may become an effective tool for opening up closed doors in both partners and promoting sharing and trust.

The relationship's lack of emotional honesty can make friendships in this combination difficult, and there is also an inability to keep more extreme emotions under control. Family relationships, especially between siblings, are similarly likely to be stormy and at times violent.

ADVICE: Don't succumb to escapism. Confront things as they are. Aim for emotional honesty and openness.

THE WEEK OF SOCIETY
LIBRA II

Accentuate the Positive

Inherently volatile and uncertain, this combination can prove confusing. A continual forward push is needed here, for the tackling of challenges can help overcome the problem of being unable to define what's really going on.

Since this combination has a quincunx aspect (its two weeks being 150° apart in the zodiac), conventional astrology predicts some instability here and is, in this case, right on the mark. Both Taurus and Libra are ruled by Venus, suggesting harmony and a shared love of beauty, but more negative traits are also reinforced, such as procrastination, laziness and provocation. There may also be a refusal to leave things be, and a tendency to complain and to get hung up on details. Putting the accent on achievement can offset these traits.

Instability can prove exciting, particularly in love, and both partners may be stimulated by this relationship. Illicit and covert affairs have an allure here. Marriage is more challenging—perhaps the most challenging kind of relationship in this combination, in fact, and also the most potentially rewarding. Negative and positive traits coalesce synergistically here. The alliance is capable of generating sensual enjoyment, play, humor and comfort; the home of a Taurus II–Libra II couple may be richly decorated yet highly functional, with many areas of the living space thought out to the last detail. As one moves from room to room in such a dwelling, flair and color alternate rhythmically with sobriety and quietude. A remarkable tranquillity can rule the domestic scene in this marriage. Still, emotional mood swings are never absent for long.

At work, this pair may suffer from a periodic paralysis of the will, a slump or an inability to concentrate. Such breakdowns may prove unacceptably counterproductive, and a boss may separate these two by relocating them within the workplace. Family relationships, particularly parent-child, may suffer from regular bouts of mutual provocation, despite long periods of relative harmony and peace.

THE WEEK OF THEATER
LIBRA III

A New Spin

Where an ordinary life can be tied up for years by the energies of imagination and fantasy, this relationship is likely to manifest dramatic breakthroughs. A catalytic agent unlocking its partners' subconscious, it can sometimes come to be seen as the beneficiary of some odd twist of fate, one with profound and far-reaching effects. Should a social, financial or business activity, say, be the recipient of the relationship's energies, it may achieve great success, provided those energies are well directed.

Matchups in this combination can be close but trying. Libra III's need plenty of attention, but far from all the time; when they need it, though, they have to get it, no matter what. They do best with partners who don't put heavy demands on them, are quite independent and have strength of character. All of these requirements can be met quite handily by Taurus II's, who gain some benefit as well: usually this takes the form of learning social skills, using the Libra III's contacts and being entertained by them.

Marriages and love affairs may be bound up in a shroud of unreality. So strong is the projection of fantasy here that the relationship can seem to have been summoned genielike from Aladdin's lamp. The results can be illusory and destructive, but the principal problem in this combination will be conflict with the demands of everyday reality, social pressures and the perceptions of friends and family who don't share this pair's vision. Should these partners be able break with societal influences, instead believing totally in the personal reality of their relationship, they may make a success of it, for as long as it lasts.

In business, a partnership providing a service or product to the general public is most favored here. These two will usually find a hole in the market by coming up with something original, or giving a new spin to an old idea. Whether it's the delivery, packaging, advertising or personal approach involved in the product that is unusual, it has a good chance of attracting attention and making a significant impact on the market.

ADVICE: Balance your personal and social life. Your fantasies may mean little to others. Take the time to explain yourself. Don't be self-centered.

THE CUSP OF DRAMA & CRITICISM

Formidable Adversaries

These two have a great deal in common. Unfortunately, their common traits and talents tend not to coalesce and augment their relationship but rather to diminish it. The sticking point is generally the issue of authority: both partners have a strong need to be the authority figure or, more particularly, the teacher, and to have others listen to them. Student-teacher relationships are difficult or impossible here. Argument, criticism and disagreement are likely to keep this pair from moving in a positive direction.

When working for rival businesses, clubs or teams, these two make formidable opponents. Their true strengths often emerge in such relationships, where they can wield their intellectual skills in a display not unlike that found in swordplay or martial arts. Nor is the intention ever in doubt: to win, overcome, defeat. Working together in the same organization, they have a chance of success if they are equally situated in the hierarchy, have minimal personal contact and are engaged in objective or technical tasks, in, for example, the areas of science, computers, medicine or language.

Love affairs, friendships and marriages may be less dominating and combative but are usually just as competitive. All can prove difficult, but marriage is perhaps the best bet of the three, since these personalities' strong energies will be grounded there by shared daily tasks and responsibilities. In certain cases a lifelong truce is possible, with aggressive instincts being sublimated or directed outward, against other couples or individuals. Affairs tend to be either passionate or prosaic, with an emphasis on frankness and open physicality, and little likelihood of deeper feelings or sympathy. Family relationships, especially between equally matched siblings, can be as intense as any other in this combination. Parent-child relationships have little to recommend them: usually the parent, whether Taurus II or Libra-Scorpio, will dominate the child, at least until a rebellious adolescence is reached and interactions can be less one-sided.

ADVICE: Try to bring out the best without undue conflict. Aim for positive goals. Minimize arguments, maximize understanding. Stick together.

Crusading Spirit

The focus of this relationship is likely to be quick mental communication. Intelligence and the transmission of ideas are highly valued here, and there is also a shared interest in books, puzzles, games and feats of memory and reasoning. There will also be a concern with social and moral codes, issues of justice and injustice, and rather forward-thinking or visionary ideas. The connection between these two is often so close that each may know what the other is thinking without a word being spoken.

The determining factor in the success of both love and marriage in this combination is whether the couple's emotional communication is as good as the mental variety. Empathic bonds are somewhat rare here, since Taurus II's do not live on the more emotional levels, and usually resist the kind of intense psychological scrutiny that is the Scorpio I specialty. Even so, sympathy and understanding can become a trademark of this relationship as long as the couple are determined to make them so. Taurus II's will generally have an aversion to the Scorpio I dark side, but may also be fascinated by it. Luckily it is the sunnier Scorpio I aspects that the relationship tends to activate.

When these two are friends or business associates, their relationship will magnify their inherent involvement in the concept of fairness. It may well demonstrate a crusading spirit, making it socially and politically active, always on the side of the oppressed, disenfranchised or socially disadvantaged. A related concern with individuals who are seriously challenged, whether mentally or physically, can become the basis for a career of service.

In the family, Taurus II parents are well suited to Scorpio I children in terms both of what they can give them and what they can accept from them. Scorpio I parents tend to be stimulating, even inspiring, to their Taurus II children. In either combination, learning, helpfulness, understanding and, of course, fairness are likely to be prominent. Sibling matchups will probably be mutually supportive and giving, playful and mentally challenging, but temperamental, like the weather.

ADVICE: Don't overemphasize logic. Acknowledge the value of feelings. Learn from each other. Develop paranormal abilities.

Second Childhood

This combination will encourage its participants to lighten up and have fun. Taurus II and Scorpio II lie opposite each other in the zodiac, making them apt to bring out each other's seriousness and wariness, yet their relationship also has a lighter side, sidestepping some of the weightiness in favor of a more playful or youthful outlook. Its aversion to power struggles and problems is such that its partners will want to maintain a healthy balance of power, carefully drawing lines of defense that they are equally careful not to transgress.

A friendship may be this duo's best chance to relax and enjoy life's more amusing side. As children, Taurus II's can make excellent playmates for Scorpio II's, and the pair's lightheartedness together may feel like a second childhood once they have grown up. Fostering humor and easy camaraderie, this relationship often works as a safety valve for the pressures and difficulties that its partners face in other areas of life.

Love and marriage, on the other hand, may involve problems with stress, emotional blockage and missed communication. Taurus II's can be very understanding, but a daily diet of Scorpio II depression and self-induced pain may push them beyond their tolerance threshold. And if aggression and resentment start flowing in their direction, they may back off or disappear altogether. Passions may run high here at first, but there is a danger that intensity and romance will lose their appeal over the years, and that deeper emotional areas will be closed off. At the same time, the relationship is likely to function quite well in more mundane areas, with daily responsibilities being faithfully discharged.

In group endeavors, whether at work or in the family, the relationship is likely to prove reliable and productive. Youthfulness can be an important theme in parent-child interactions, but the parent, of either week of the year, is sometimes apt to go overboard in trying to look young and to be hip, cool and up-to-date, while the child meanwhile strives to be more adult and mature. Such role reversals can produce interesting but at times ludicrous results.

ADVICE: Stay youthful but be dignified. Accept maturity but don't be too serious. Loosen up and have fun. Don't close off or shut down.

Balance of Power

This relationship works on creating a balance of individual strengths so that they augment rather than fight one another, particularly in the service of a career or business endeavor. Power struggles rarely emerge here, and both partners can mute their ego drives in the pursuit of common goals, not only working together but learning from each other. Productive organizationally, the relationship also serves both partners' personal development.

A Taurus II–Scorpio III friendship can be vitally important to each of its participants, often more so than a love affair or marriage would be. Heavy expectations here can be counterproductive, however, and strict and unforgiving attitudes may make a free and easy exchange difficult or impossible. Taurus II–Scorpio III love affairs can be complex: passion, sexual attraction and jealousy can run high, with pain and suffering too inevitably close behind. A certain personal magnetism here may result in love triangles, which will have destructive results. The Scorpio III need for emotional honesty and full expression may be thwarted or wounded by Taurus II critical attitudes and frank assessments; also, Taurus II's like to be left alone a lot of the time, and the controlling or claiming stance of the classic Scorpio III is likely to annoy them.

Marriages between these two can be effective, especially when goals are well defined and the power structure is balanced. Enjoyable and fulfilling sexual interaction may continue right into old age. As parents, however, these two must be careful not to overwhelm their children, or to allow their respective, radically different approaches to raising them to cause confusion. Similarly, although Taurus II–Scorpio III family relationships may be quite favorable (particularly in times of need), the moral stance of a Taurus II parent and the controlling and protective attitudes of a Scorpio III elder can become disturbing or debilitating to a child of the other sign.

ADVICE: Bring different points of view into balance. At home, work for the common good. Don't expect too much. Simplify love.

Graduate School

Acceptance is the focus of this relationship, and the key to success in emotional, physical and spiritual matters as well as intellectual ones. The partners are likely to come from different social and religious backgrounds, and if they realize how rich in diversity, and therefore how valuable, such a relationship can be, they will work hard to protect these differences instead of insisting on meaningless uniformity. Taurus II's generally believe in the value of teaching, whether in an institution or one-on-one, while Scorpio-Sagittarians are often graduates of the school of hard knocks, and believe that life experience is the true teacher. Formed by such different sources, this relationship can gather knowledge from the broadest spectrum of wisdom, as long as it can make space for the acceptance of differences.

Love here is likely to be direct, intense and unpredictable. The more unstable sides of both partners will often meld in a wildly romantic affair, which sweeps everything before it. Carnally, each of these two will meet their match in the other, but they will need to check their combative instincts. Scorpio-Sagittarius "memory lapses" may be a problem, since Taurus II's are unlikely to be patient either with indiscretions and infidelities or with lying about them. Marriage is likely to dull the flame of romance, which feeds so richly here on uncertainty and secrecy. Yet this couple's stability may be enhanced by commitment, so that domestic matters benefit in the more permanent relationship. Taurus II's may be strong enough to hold on to Scorpio-Sagittarians, who combine a drive toward infidelity with an equal, but more hidden, need to be loyal. Family life may come to agree with this duo, sublimating their wildness to the steady energy needed for a whole spectrum of activities, from domestic projects to family businesses to travel.

Intimate friendships and sibling and business partnerships are likely between Taurus II's and Scorpio-Sagittarians of the same sex, but parent-child and boss-employee relationships may be destructive or counterproductive. In successful relationships here, trust, honor and, above all, acceptance receive high priority.

ADVICE: Keep differences alive. Condemning and repressive attitudes diminish your value. Be expressive but not chaotic. Ground yourself in daily life.

Haven for the Dispossessed

This relationship may well involve a team that gives leadership and direction to new enterprises, whether businesses, social groups, families or marriages, that demand a knack for timing as an important part of their success. Both Taurus II's and Sagittarius I's are high-minded individuals, but their relationship may bring out a secretive aspect in them, possibly having to do with money. It can also provide an outlet for each partner's less stable or reliable side, possibly creating chaos or near disaster. Everything gets exposed here sooner or later, and covert activities may cause scandal when brought to light.

Love affairs are stormy here, to say the least, but highly exciting. It is a relationship in which sex does not by any means imply intimacy, for there may well be a lot of the former and far less of the latter, at least in the early stages. Later on, intimacy may take the place of passion, perhaps leading to friendship or marriage. Together, the partners may explore hidden emotional areas never before revealed to parents or the world (or else hidden since childhood or early adolescence).

Friendships in this combination are rarely static, and often evolve into business relations, marriages, social or sports partnerships, or challenging activities built around nature, camping or exploration. A conventional or comfortable relationship, exhibiting an easy give-and-take, is rarely possible here. Family relationships, whether sibling or parent-child, can demonstrate deep mutual understanding. Both Taurus II's and Sagittarius I's usually love animals, are great believers in truth and honor, and despise discrimination or injustice in any form. A family containing such a combination can become a haven for the dispossessed and a champion of the underdog, a class that may well include a reasonable percentage of neighborhood castoffs and strays. Partnerships and organizations in which these two work as boss and employee can flounder until financial weaknesses are pinpointed and addressed. Taurus II's will generally be the more realistic of the pair, while Sagittarius I's are often taken up with exciting new ideas that do not always pan out.

ADVICE: Work on being more practical and less chaotic. Reconcile passion and intimacy. Don't get carried away by idealism. Not everything has to be revealed.

An Invitation to Intimacy

This relationship can push its partners to explore deeper realms of feeling, spirituality, intimacy and other qualities. It is a pairing in which sensitivities must be handled with understanding and acceptance but also with toughness and resolution, so that sympathy does not lead to dishonesty or deviousness in confronting reality.

Sagittarius II's are notably hard to reach emotionally and tremendously demanding of understanding, especially in matters of love. They may find just the right partner in a Taurus II. These two astrological periods are quincunx to each other in the zodiac (150° apart), and in traditional astrology are therefore said to promote instability, but the excitement and interest generated by this relationship may well offset this disadvantage. Sagittarius II nervousness will get a Taurus II wound up as well, but Taurus II's have vast reserves of stability and understanding to ground the relationship and give it direction. Chances are that Sagittarius II's won't allow them to get too close emotionally at the outset, even when the two are physically intimate, but a solid trust may be built up over time. Psychologically astute Taurus II's have much to teach Sagittarius II's about themselves, and for their part will thoroughly enjoy this partner's original brand of thinking. On the downside, there is a risk that Sagittarius II's can become dependent on Taurus II's, and at times may sacrifice their dignity when asking for help (or even, in extreme cases where they sense rejection, when pleading for it). Taurus II's will find this intolerable; if the relationship is to succeed, dignity will have to be preserved.

Intimacy in love doesn't necessarily translate into intimacy in marriage, and a love affair here is usually better off without the effort to make it more permanent. Similarly, work and family relationships in this combination often run into difficulties precisely because they have the stamp of permanence. Long-lasting friendships may have the same problem. Little can be done about this when Taurus II-Sagittarius II spouses have children, but friends and co-workers may be better off as acquaintances and freelancers, seeking each other out only when they want or need to.

ADVICE: Be honest. Confront yourself. Don't take sympathy for granted. Don't compromise your self-respect. Responsibility need not be a threat.

Tremendous Drive to Build

These two will build sound structures, whether ideological or physical. Their relationship is complementary: together they have the skills they need to create any system, no matter how large. This duo may be especially talented in matters of procedure and efficiency. Goals tend to be extremely well defined here.

Taurus II's know that to come between Sagittarius III's and their intended destination is to court disaster. Also understanding enough to see that the same goes for Sagittarius III moods, they are not often stupid enough to attempt to rouse these Titans from the grand funks into which they periodically fall. Mature Sagittarius III's are likewise able to give Taurus II's the latitude they need, so that the relationship's tremendous drive to build something of lasting value—the major theme here—is rarely undercut or interrupted by emotional issues.

This combination is best suited for working situations and marriages, in which a business or family system needs to be set up, administered and maintained. Not only the literal structure of the office or house will benefit here but also the ideas, plans and strategies that bring success to career and domestic endeavors alike. In marriages, however, issues such as neglect, favoritism, insensitivity and rejection can become problematic and even explosive, whether expressed or repressed. Conflict here can bring things to a grinding halt. In love affairs, similarly, Taurus II's will not enjoy playing second fiddle to a Sagittarius III's career, or being dominated by this partner. These two may build friendships around shared activities, but the Sagittarius III need to be in control may make it difficult for the relationship to achieve easy camaraderie and equal participation. Family relationships, especially of the parent-child variety, are likely to arouse power struggles that can rattle the home's walls and its inhabitants' teeth; in this case, the relationship may weaken structure rather than reinforce it. As the children grow older, however, mutual respect may begin to grow between them and their parents, so that when they reach maturity much of the conflict will have been resolved.

ADVICE: Lessen power struggles. Don't let emotions interfere with work. Increase understanding through mature attitudes. Promote equality.

Unspoken Communication

Despite each partner's preponderantly physical orientation in other matchups, this relationship is likely to concentrate on the more ethereal realms of the spirit. Together, Taurus II's and Sagittarius-Capricorns may enjoy the exploration or study of esoteric or metaphysical topics. Their strong psychic connection often transcends barriers of space. Unspoken understanding and communication are more characteristic of the relationship than sympathy and expressions of feeling; these two have a tendency to merge with each other, in fact, that if too pronounced can create boundary issues.

The success of love relationships in this combination generally depends on how far Taurus II's are willing to go in plumbing the hidden depths of the enigmatic Sagittarius-Capricorn personality. Often attracted to easier and more pleasurable relationships, they may be scared off by Sagittarius-Capricorn intensity, or may pull back at some negative interaction. Should the relationship continue, both parties must be ready for the gamut of emotions that tends to arise in their more intense exchanges, from the more disturbingly emotional areas of resentment, frustration and jealousy to exalted spiritual highs. Ultimately the partnership may become an ongoing flow of merger, separation, merger, separation, and so on.

Friendships and working relationships will exhibit a marked interest in spiritual and psychic matters, fostering interesting conversations and possible participation in new-age and other such leisure-time activities. These relationships are often better off remaining where they are than moving on to romance or marriage: should the Sagittarius-Capricorn be rejected in any way by the Taurus II, great suffering will probably result, and a breakup may mean losing the original relationship as well, or facing a level of damage that precludes beginning anew. Regret and grief over this kind of loss may be among the most difficult scenarios this relationship can face. Family relationships can be close here, especially parent-child combinations and those between siblings of the same sex.

Hard to Figure Out

To those who know Taurus II's and Capricorn I's as individuals, this relationship will probably be somewhat puzzling. Its raison d'être isn't always clear, even for its partners, should one ask them; they are often too busy giving structure to a family or business to be concerned with self-understanding. In fact, if the shared activity around which the relationship is built ends or falls apart, the partners may find little in the way of an emotional or spiritual bond to hold them together.

Intimate relationships here, especially love affairs and friendships, may be the hardest to figure out. Usually intensely private, they may not be deliberately hidden from the world, but they aren't actively exposed either. The partners may have been thrown together in the oddest and most unexpected circumstances, perhaps necessitated by the fact that they travel in such different circles, and have such mutually exclusive activities, that they might otherwise never have met. Yet they may have an immediate sympathy or fascination for each other, one that demands further interaction. The neglect of an existing relationship of some standing is often demanded here, increasing the level of tension, suspicion and mistrust all around. It may all be worth it, for this is seldom a quick fling; it is a serious, karmic relationship that must be thoroughly and laboriously worked through before it can be ended, with one lifetime perhaps not enough.

Taurus II–Capricorn I marriages will be enhanced by both partners' honesty and sense of tradition, but Taurus II's will find their mate's authoritarian attitudes oppressive, both to themselves and to their children or younger relatives. Wisely, Taurus II's will rarely try to oppose the Capricorn I need to take the lead, but in a subtle and diplomatic way will seek their own areas of concern and control within the relationship. Problems can arise if Capricorn I intolerance assumes a prejudicial tone, for discrimination, or even small jokes or assumptions about others, can have a very bad effect on Taurus II's. Parent-child relationships, especially when Capricorn I is the parent, may likewise feature battles over intolerant and unaccepting attitudes.

ADVICE: Don't hide what you have. Respect other people's feelings, and put yourself in their place. Break down walls of mistrust.

Withdrawal from Scrutiny

This relationship is likely to create a somewhat private domain, withdrawn from the scrutiny of the world—perhaps literally so, in an isolated, even secret location. Few are admitted to this close bond, whether as observers or third-party participants.

Love and friendship are intensely personal here. These partners view their relationship less as a social unit than as a haven, and when together they will rarely place themselves in the company of others. The fact that Taurus II and Capricorn II are trine to each other (120° apart in the zodiac) helps them to establish an easy and earthy familiarity. Given the relationship's introverted orientation, intimacy and the exploration of the inner life are priorities. Both partners may lead quite active and normal worldly lives by themselves, but when they are together their relationship has a way of shutting out external noise and distractions.

Marriages in this combination will value a getaway or vacation place in a beautiful natural setting, guaranteeing rest and relaxation for a period of time each year. One danger is that self-imposed isolation will have a somewhat harmful effect on children, particularly if this attitude also prevails at home. This couple's ability to allow others to share their joys and sorrows will be one indication of their relationship's security and health. Above all, incipient feelings of fear, xenophobia or, in extreme cases, paranoia should be nipped in the bud.

Family relationships, especially between single parents and their children, or between siblings of the opposite sex, can become too exclusive. Although such relationships can be rich, deep, rewarding and highly protective, they may become neurotically antisocial and not conducive to normal growth in childhood.

Co-workers of this combination in a company or organization can become lifelong friends. Breakups necessitated by sectional reorganizations or company relocations may prove painful, and a similar relationship may prove impossible to establish with others. As business partners, these two may enjoy each other's company and be too relaxed to achieve great commercial success, unless they are extremely well directed.

ADVICE: Stay open to objective monitoring. Don't lose touch with reality. Pursue more outgoing activities. Intimacy need not isolate.

CAPRICORN III

Winning Out, Efficiently

This often hard-driving and enthusiastic combination focuses powerfully on getting the job done in the most efficient and practical way possible. It is extremely adept at ferreting out all kinds of wasteful energies and redirecting them positively. Although this formidable duo can be a bit overbearing, it is usually impressive enough to inspire (or coerce) cooperation in the most difficult of individuals.

Love affairs here can be physically satisfying, to say the least. These relationships are not without combative elements, which, however, are not completely negative in effect; instead, they heighten intensity and raise the stakes—victory can be an important theme here. Strangely enough, although this kind of striving generally asserts a priority over kindness, love and consideration, it does not preclude them. Should the relationship break up as a consequence of one of these struggles, the partners may show true compassion for each other, and sadness rather than exultation is most often the dominant feeling.

Marriages and friendships are likely to lack the intensity of love affairs, but can certainly be more relaxed and pleasant. Taurus II's will suffer terrible bewilderment when power struggles do arise, since they haven't usually invested much time in building the tough, enduring and resilient attitudes of Capricorn III's. An unspoken truce should therefore periodically be put into effect at such times.

As the heads of commercial, social or sports organizations, or of families, these two are skillful at getting the best out of people. A decent showing is usually not enough for them; producing winning combinations is what this relationship is all about. The danger is that extreme differences of opinion within this relationship will tear the group as a whole into two camps, with sides being taken and internal conflict raging out of control. As long as this pair's individual egos are in the service of the group, or of a higher cause, harmony will usually prevail. The presence of a formidable enemy or rival can be useful in promoting internal cohesion.

ADVICE: A win can also be a loss. True love has little to do with triumph. Cultivate kinder attitudes. Limit competitiveness. Play for fun.

THE CUSP OF MYSTERY & IMAGINATION

Dream World

This relationship often lacks a firm grounding in reality. Ideals, fantasies and dreams figure prominently here, which may be all well and good for creative work, but which makes it difficult for this pair to get their dreams off the ground. This will feel odd and undermining to them, since ordinarily they have a talent for laying out plans. Underlying the relationship is a lack of dependability, which in turn arouses insecurities and undercuts permanence.

Flashy Capricorn-Aquarians may be very appealing to Taurus II's, and earthy Taurus II sensuality and mental acuity are attractive to their exciting partners. Even so, this relationship is unlikely to go far. Fantasy and the desire to follow their dreams may pull Taurus II's away from their usual pragmatic and sensible stance, but the results will not always be what they had wished. The disappointment of failed expectations on both sides may prove to be the relationship's legacy, unless the effort is made to be more realistic and take things as they come.

It is in the areas of friendship and love that impractical expectations are likely to be most damaging. It is characteristic of these relationships for both parties to be swept away upon first meeting each other and subsequently sharing their dreams and visions. After spending time together (perhaps quite a bit of time), interacting with others as a couple and being forced to defend their relationship against criticism, they will probably have a slightly more realistic view of things. Finally, when disagreements surface and closeness fades, they may realize that much they had hoped for can never be. Accepting this can be difficult and sad, but alas is inevitable in most cases.

Marriages and family and work relationships have a better chance of permanence, partly because mutual commitment may come more easily here, and partly for logistical reasons: responsibility has a sobering effect on this relationship, and although somewhat detrimental to its romantic side, contributes powerfully to its longevity. Here the relationship becomes concerned less with the personalities and visions of its partners and more with effectiveness, efficiency and the attainment of tangible goals through group efforts.

ADVICE: Keep your feet on the ground. Don't be too hopeful or expectant. Aim for short-term goals. Success can be achieved a step at a time.

THE WEEK OF GENIUS

Peeling Away Illusions

What a beautiful combination—the brilliant Taurus II Teacher and the Aquarius I Genius student! Or is it? Alas, geniuses are often maladjusted, teachers frustrated, and their personal interactions an emotional disaster. When these two get together, their high ideals fall away, and they find themselves focusing on the most literal, most mundane details—and, staking a position on these, engaging in wars of nit-picking and criticism. There is the possibility that Taurus II's and Aquarius I's will make a go of it as like admirers not so much of each other but of aesthetic beauty and creativity in art, music and literature. Lacking real depth of feeling and passion in their own relationship, they may choose to find it in the works of others. Besides enjoying the arts, they may also be drawn to physical and sensuous beauty in people or, less often, in nature.

Friendships and love affairs in this combination are often taken up with tangible realities, like ready cash, expensive gifts, new cars, exotic vacations and the like. They can be considered superficial, but exhibit a kind of creative thinking that allows them to reach a level that most can only dream of. They are also capable of moving on to more meaningful experiences, perhaps involving the abandonment of such worldly pursuits, once these desires have been fulfilled. Spirituality may for this pair be an end achieved only after pursuing, attaining and finally peeling away many levels of illusion.

Marriages in this combination may be quite sensible affairs, built on practical premises and seeking attainable goals. Much time may be given over to an immensely satisfying pursuit of beauty and pleasure, in a comfortable domestic setting. Family relationships—particularly between uncle or aunt and nephew or niece, or between grandparent and grandchild—are likely to feature mutual appreciation of entertainment, special family get-togethers and the joys of play, whether mild sports or games. If co-workers in this combination have fun with each other regularly away from work, the potential of their relationship will be more fully developed, producing positive effects in the workplace.

ADVICE: Achieve material goals, then find more meaningful ones. Keep on searching. Stay on your path. Don't sell out to money.

New Life

The focus of this relationship is rejuvenation. Breathing new life into shared projects, the other partner or even oneself is the specialty here, particularly when one has suffered failed relationships in the past, or has become jaded toward life. Not only may Taurus II's and Aquarius II's themselves benefit from this effect, but their relationship can serve as a model for other individuals and couples, teaching by example rather than precept. Revived feelings and emotions, perhaps disavowed or buried, can spring to life here in a glorious new setting. Appreciation not only of the joys of human life generally but specifically of rebirth in nature, as in springtime revels, is characteristic.

In love affairs, Taurus II's may be more what Aquarius II's need than what they want. Taurus II's are likely to be the more serious and emotionally mature of the pair, and to see Aquarius II's as childish; yet Aquarius II's may also awaken childlike qualities in them, letting them have fun and relax. In marriage, Aquarius II's risk trying to please their Taurus II spouses too much; in trying to live up to their partner's expectations they may forsake their own identity and life path. Children are of course deeply appreciated in a relationship so squarely based on the theme of rebirth, and Taurus II–Aquarius II parents can truly cherish their offspring. This is no guarantee that they will be financially responsible or emotionally stable, but a caring and deeply interested attitude toward their children is usually characteristic of them.

The most comfortable family relationships in this combination usually come when a Taurus II is the parent, grandparent, uncle or aunt to an Aquarius II child. Friendships and working relationships in this combination are usually easygoing, but require constant renewal through a broad spectrum of at least mildly challenging experiences. The worst scenario in this kind of relationship is to get stuck in a rut of repetitiveness. Business relationships here are often formed around new endeavors. Starting up a business, or reviving a failed one, is preferred to taking over a functioning enterprise.

A Deeper Rapport

This relationship brings the critical natures of both partners to the fore. Irritations, arguments and complaints are common, but there is also the possibility of each partner learning from the other, and of a deeper emotional rapport. Despite strife and conflict, or actually through them, a fairly harmonious balance can often be reached. These two need to learn when to leave well enough alone, however; in this relationship they are prone to constant tinkering, not only with the relationship but with each other's characters.

A lot of this relationship is out in the open, so that it tends to avoid frustration and the kind of suppression of feelings that leads to depression. Love affairs in this combination bring out the more volatile and aggressive side of Taurus II's, and Aquarius III's will have to stretch their ability to accept such behavior to the limit. They may need more love and attention than Taurus II's can bear to provide. Rejections here are often temporary, however, leaving the door open to reconciliations in which the partners put negativity behind them and try to correct their problems and address their issues. The relationship is likely to be a maturing experience, in which a great deal is learned about living and, especially, about how two people get along together.

Marriages in this combination will test Taurus II patience, for Aquarius III's need constant variety and change and can act very irresponsibly on occasion. Taurus II's will positively influence them, however, to meet their everyday obligations. Should Taurus II moral attitudes, stubbornness and dominance come to the fore, however, recalcitrance and rebellion are likely to result from the Aquarius III, fracturing and disabling the relationship. At work and as friends, Taurus II's and Aquarius III's get along well unless the relationship's demands become too great. If either of these personalities are parents, the perfectionistic tendencies in the relationship may be hard on either Taurus II or Aquarius III children, who will find it hard to live with being constantly pushed to improve themselves.

ADVICE: Be more patient. See conflict as a learning experience. Rejection should be temporary. Let go of resentments. Overlook imperfection.

AQUARIUS-PISCES CUSP

Bringing Childhood Alive

This relationship often deals with childhood feelings and situations. The stirring up of childhood memories is a central issue in the lives of Aquarius-Pisces, and is seldom a pleasant experience, albeit therapeutically necessary in cases of near-total repression. Taurus II's are also likely to benefit from examining their early years, but their own experiences may be easier to deal with than those of an Aquarius-Pisces. The examination of one's childhood in a critical and constructive light is less a matter of intellectual history than of bringing the past alive in the present and dealing with it in a healthier way than one could at the time.

Much acting out of childhood role patterns may emerge in marriages, friendships and love affairs between Taurus II's and Aquarius-Pisces, especially when the former stands in the parental role and the latter in the child's. Should this dynamic go unrecognized, Taurus II's may be bewildered by the depth of feeling they arouse in their partners, until it starts to dawn on them that this welter of emotion is not meant for them but for someone else. This will inevitably lead to a certain amount of resentment, and will affront the Taurus II sense of fairness. These roles may also be reversed, which can be quite healthy for Aquarius-Pisces, who may at last have to confront and perhaps sympathize with the difficulty of being a parent when they are forced to play that part themselves.

Family relationships are likely to focus on the very youngest years, those of infancy. Themes of helplessness and dependency, but also of innocent love and life-giving support, are likely to emerge here. By caring for a newborn child, sibling, grandchild or niece or nephew, various combinations of Taurus II's and Aquarius-Pisces may relive positive and negative aspects of their own childhoods, consciously exploring how such elements hold over in the day-to-day running of their lives as adults.

ADVICE: Psychological investigations can distract you from work. Be more aware of role patterns. Learn from your past, particularly your childhood.

Extra Traffic

The thrust of this relationship will probably be social. Although Taurus is an earth sign and Pisces water (respectively denoting sensation and feeling), together these two are likely to explore the realms of thought and communication, provinces of the element of air. Favored here are group activities within which the relationship can function as an integral unit. It would not be surprising to find this pair actively involved in charity work or other causes that would involve them with others.

Friendships and love affairs will depend heavily on social interaction. Indeed the relationship's quality is often defined by the nature of its behavior in social settings. Taurus II's and Pisces I's are often interested in music, dancing, film and other entertainments, and together they may prove the moving force in organizing a group of family and friends to share in such activities. Being with other people so much of the time moves personal problems out of the spotlight, and makes the pair more relaxed, but also deprives them of the ability to confront each other, work out issues and deepen their relationship. They are of course capable of enjoying intimacy, but it is the social dimension that provides the punch for these two.

Marriages can either benefit or suffer from all this socializing. Having friends constantly present may weaken or strengthen domestic bonds, and the extra traffic around the house may eventually prove nerve-racking. Furthermore, both of these individuals have a reclusive side that their relationship may suppress, almost certainly creating tension. Triangles are common here, often hiding behind a facade of friendship but capable of surfacing and shattering the fragile bonds of the primary relationship. Choices inevitably have to be made, and they may be hard and painful.

Family relationships, particularly sibling and parent-child matchups, can be close, sympathetic and supportive. In the workplace, the Taurus II–Pisces I relationship may be entertaining to the group but unable to hold up its end of things, especially when brute stamina, application and concentration are required.

ADVICE: Spend enough time alone. Needing attention should not become addictive. Enjoy each other without distractions. Improve social skills.

Eminently Qualified

There is a natural sympathy between these two, but also a competition over who will be the center of attention. This can be dealt with if each individual sacrifices ego needs for the good of the pair, concentrating on making the relationship itself shine in a circle of friends or family. Thus a divisive tendency can instead become a unifying theme, turning a weakness into a strength. Another example of positive metamorphosis here appears in the financial sphere, where Taurus II's and Pisces II's who tend to be spend-thrifts, or who are unrealistic about long-range investments, can do a turnaround as a duo, together showing financial astuteness and good sense.

Love affairs are a notable area in which competition for attention can divide the partners and create open conflict. Needs and demands of this kind can get out of hand, and if the partners fail to receive attention from each other, they may be forced to seek it elsewhere. This can undermine the relationship's stability, and in worst-case scenarios can destroy it.

Friendships and marriages are probably the most likely setups in this combination to be successful in transforming egotistical drives. In these kinds of relationship, this pair may be eminently qualified to serve as a progressive force for change, a refuge for others in times of need and a dependable anchor in providing economic stability. This may also be true of Taurus II's and Pisces II's who go into business together, whether they are also spouses or friends or their connection is purely commercial. The Taurus II refusal to try to make rules governing the actions of those they live and work with can be helpful in avoiding conflict here, for this kind of attitude is essential for the happiness and productivity of Pisces II's.

In family relationships, particularly parent-child matchups of either combination, rebellion against strict authority is unlikely to be an issue. But the opposite attitude—excessive permissiveness and absence of guidance—may prove a problem if it encourages rebellious or sociopathic behavior in the outside world.

ADVICE: Beware of being too permissive. Guidance is often a crying need. Don't let the need for attention get out of hand. Cultivate quiet confidence.

Performance Arts

This relationship stimulates extroversion, and indeed its focus may well be a fascination with performance, whether as participants or as audience. A melding of interests in music, dance, theater and design is often prominent here. The relationship may be known for its aesthetic orientation in its immediate environment, and can even reach a wider circle, perhaps by mounting stage productions or supervising activities of artistic interest.

In love affairs and marriages, a balance must be struck between intimacy, quiet, contemplation and extroversion. Passionate Taurus II's may at times be a bit threatening to mild Pisces III's, who, however, are quite capable of matching this partner's sensuousness on a regular basis. They may diverge when Taurus II's take a frank and uncompromising approach to the relationship, eschewing emotional sympathy and romance—essential qualities to many Pisces III's. Independent Taurus II's will also be unwilling or unable to satisfy the Pisces III need to be needed.

Within the family, this relationship may have a strong effect in promoting knowledge and enjoyment of performance arts. This influence can bring a great deal to the group's overall cultural awareness. A Taurus II–Pisces III friendship will similarly exert its influence on a social circle that enjoys going out to clubs and concerts.

It is essential to both Pisces III's and Taurus II's that both they and their co-workers (or, if they are bosses, their employees) be happy in the workplace and enjoy themselves at work-related social gatherings. In and of itself, work means little to them without this kind of emotional reward. And if they are business partners or executives, they are clever enough to realize that good will and happiness, as well as tangible signs of appreciation (perhaps in the form of gifts or bonuses), are powerful motivating factors in meeting deadlines and production quotas.

ADVICE: Develop your meditative side. Cultivate your inner space. Don't get carried away with social activities. Leave time for quiet intimacy.

A Barrel of Monkeys

How natural can you get? Although this relationship has an undeniable tendency to let it all hang out, repressive and inhibiting tendencies may be at work as well, particularly if the partners' talents, interests and activities are divergent or mutually exclusive, with each disapproving of the other's approach. Yet if these two are able to respect such differences, as they usually can, the relationship's value will be enhanced rather than diminished. These two fun-loving individuals make an exuberant and joyous combination, albeit a chaotic one. On the downside, they may bring out each other's not inconsiderable insecurities, creating an underlying instability.

Two Taurus III's can be more fun than a barrel of monkeys. Enjoyment is of paramount importance here, and the only single rule is to be oneself. Love affairs and friendships are often affectionate and open rather than deep and passionate, and instability and infidelity can threaten the relationship's longevity, but sharing and acceptance often alleviate what for others could be insurmountable difficulties. Jealousy and claiming attitudes are seldom a problem here.

Marriages and work relationships in this combination can be highly productive, but vacations, entertainment and humor are essential to keep mates and co-workers in a positive frame of mind. Criticism from grandparents, bosses or other colleagues or family members on how children are raised or work is done can be an extremely sensitive point, often revealing underlying feelings of inferiority and producing anger and aggression; the relationship may impulsively switch into strong defense or attack modes.

Families with pairs of Taurus III parents, siblings, grandparents or aunts and uncles can be vivacious groups. These matchups will enliven the lives not only of family members but of those attached to them through bonds of friendship, love, work and marriage. But the energy level of these families can be chaotic at times, disturbing siblings or parents of a more serious or meditative nature.

ADVICE: Develop greater self-trust. Work on rooting out insecurities. Criticism need not be a threat. Stabilize your feelings. Seek moderation.

THE CUSP OF ENERGY
TAURUS-GEMINI CUSP

Hair-Trigger Responses

Although one would expect a melding of these two to produce “natural energy,” the chemical equation here is not always straightforward or simple. True, the relationship is often positive and indeed charming, but rebelliousness and competitiveness can arise as well. A tendency for both partners to think they know best can undermine the relationship’s solidity and its capacity to act effectively as a unit; these two often move in opposite directions from the start. Both Taurus III’s and Taurus-Geminis have hair-trigger tempers when they receive what they see as unfair criticism, but their relationship with each other often magnifies such responses out of all proportion.

Although earth and air, elements of sensation and thought respectively, appear to dominate here (Taurus being an earth sign, Gemini air), feelings (water) tend to run high in this combination, and in fact are its greatest challenge. In love affairs and between friends, powerful emotions can be rewarding, destructive or both. Serious instabilities and mood swings can mar even the more blissful moments of such relationships, with the sudden surfacing of negative, even violently destructive feelings bewildering both partners.

The shared tasks of work and marriage often help stabilize this relationship. At work, intense productivity is possible if emotion can be kept out of the picture. The energy level here can be extremely high, but burnout and collapse are also constant dangers. Parents and bosses of either sign will have to show great sensitivity if they are not to arouse rebellious attitudes in their children and employees.

Parent-child and sibling relationships, although often warm and understanding, may also include serious difficulties with judgmental attitudes, rejection and lack of sympathy. Arguments often arise over the handling of domestic matters, with stubborn convictions being defended on both sides.

ADVICE: Explore emotional areas with awareness. Understanding can alleviate rebelliousness. Conserve energies at work. Practice patience.

An Eclectic Blend

Energy is the keyword of this combination, which manifests activity and movement, particularly of the kind that goes out into the world and gets what it wants. The relationship is characterized not so much by ambition, or a desire to control, as by a lust for life. Diverse in its interests, it manifests an eclectic blend of style, politics, philosophy, aesthetics and love of nature. The energy between the partners is palpable, virtually visible to the naked eye. These two affect each other profoundly, heightening each other's sensitivity to visual, auditory and olfactory stimuli but also making themselves nervous, impatient and irritable. The lines of communication between them are open, however, and they love conversation, often of the rapid, incessant variety that makes for scintillating exchanges (if also sometimes repetitive ones). This duo will often be invited to attend parties and other social gatherings where they can air their lively and up-to-date views on many subjects.

Love affairs in this combination may be problematic. Taurus III's will generally seek a deeper level of involvement than may be desired by Gemini I's, who may be disturbed by outlandish or erratic Taurus III behavior but can also back off because they often have difficulty making a total commitment. Taurus III's are sensitive to rejection, and are likely to read this behavior as one.

Once a commitment has been made, however, marriages in this combination can be quite solid. It's true that they can be plagued by ungrounded energies, particularly given both partners' tendency to roam—unfaithfulness here is no surprise. But over time, this can be reduced to an issue of no great importance. One of the joys of this relationship will be the development of unusual tastes in home decorating, clothing and music.

Taurus III–Gemini I business partnerships are often dynamic and successful. But the handling of finances can quickly run out of hand, featuring uncontrolled spending and concomitant personal debts and credit-card bills. Hiring good bookkeepers and accountants, and heeding their advice, may be a partial solution here.

ADVICE: Cultivate calm and repose. Learn to relax. Turn off your motor mouth occasionally. Concentrate on one thing at a time. Control spending.

A Creative Outlet

Awildness can manifest here, reinforcing these partners' freedom-loving, eccentric sides. Since the relationship focuses on independence, however, the resulting lack of stability or security is not necessarily bad for it. Furthermore, although the combination may encourage a desire to overthrow tradition, or to combat more sedate modes of thought or behavior, it isn't really as destabilizing as it can seem. These two are quite capable of settling down to work within the system if they want to, and the revolutionary temperament that they encourage in each other may be mainly a form of play or creativity that, if given an outlet, can leave them quite staid individuals.

Love and marriage will usually only work out if both parties can be independent in thought and action. Indeed, they may be happiest living separately, feeling no heavy responsibilities to each other, and above all getting together only when they want to. If one of them is needy, however, particularly a Gemini II in search of a strong, stable, dependable partner, he or she is likely to end up frustrated and resentful. Taurus III's tired of shouldering daily responsibilities may likewise begin to see Gemini II's as flaky and unreliable.

Undemanding friendships can work here, particularly since these two are likely to value innovative and unconventional attitudes, and in particular are likely to develop unusual forms of communication featuring creative uses of language. Both partners will probably be enthusiastic about this relationship as a creative outlet in their lives. Parent-child matchups may be less free than the relationship requires, leading to breakdowns in communication, but siblings are likely to admire each other's talents and abilities, which often coalesce effectively in sports, hobbies, clubs and other group endeavors. Perhaps the most successful relationships in this combination will be working ones, which may feature open channels of communication, a meeting of technical skills, and the provision of structure and stability—particularly when these two are co-workers at the same level in the hierarchy.

ADVICE: Pursue common goals but retain your individuality. Don't expect too much. Give what is needed on a day-to-day basis. Learn from each other.

Absolute Freedom

In the best-case scenario, the extreme need for freedom here will apply to the relationship itself rather than to its partners. Together they may yearn to break through limitations of time and space, and even succeed in doing so. This pair will balk at all forms of constriction, definition, repression and dominance.

Absolute freedom is difficult to maintain within any love relationship, however, and this one is no exception. Thus friendships are more realistic here. The absence of sexual passion, jealousy and claiming attitudes will lessen internal conflict, while the duo will be able to act together dynamically in a variety of activities, whether in a social, outdoor or creative setting.

At work, Taurus III–Gemini III pairs may cause trouble to employers, bosses and executives, and may even have to be separated. If left to work on their own as a team, however, perhaps trouble-shooting or developing new projects, they can be of great value to an organization. Marriages between them may be less successful, especially if children are involved. The patience and domestic skills necessary to make close and stable family life feasible are not usually forthcoming in this relationship. If these two give themselves over to travel, on the other hand, periodically changing jobs, careers or residences—in short, constantly seeking new horizons, or believing they can if they want to—the marriage may be mutually satisfying. Gemini III financial skills and Taurus III social abilities will aid greatly in such innovative endeavors.

As siblings, Taurus III's and Gemini III's are likely to be rebellious against parental authority, and to seek autonomy at an early age. They will want to go where they want to, when they want to, without explanation or permission. If this freedom is granted, they may be quite affectionate and sympathetic to their parents, but if it is denied, expect the worst.

ADVICE: Compromise occasionally. Learn the value of diplomacy. Others want their freedom, too. You can carry your home with you—inside.

THE CUSP OF MAGIC

Opening New Worlds

This relationship focuses on larger realms, foreign lands, and philosophical or religious systems, to which it needs to apply independent thinking. It expands the higher mind. The problems lie in its handling of the mundane: these partners are quite different in their needs, wants and styles, ebullient Taurus III extroversion and enchanting Gemini-Cancer introversion making them an unlikely pair. Still, although Taurus is an earth sign and Gemini-Cancer fuses air and water, their relationship emphasizes fire, the element of initiation and intuition. If they spend time originating projects and pursuing dreams, allowing themselves passion, excitement and challenge, their relationship will profit.

Love between these partners, particularly romantic love, will be charmed and seductive. Intimacy both at home (the Gemini-Cancer contribution) and in nature (a Taurus III specialty) will allow meaningful sharing. Psychologically, each partner may have a lifelong secret wish that can be satisfied only by someone almost their opposite; as in so many fairy tales, Gemini-Cancers and Taurus III's may fall in love with a projection of their own deepest, often unrecognized inner self. The differences between these two become more pronounced in marriages and friendships. Taurus III's will have to understand the Gemini-Cancer need for both privacy and intimacy, and to restrain themselves both from flooding the house with guests at all hours and from being away from home too much. Gemini-Cancers in turn may need to learn to be more sociable.

These two might do well as business partners marketing an exciting product or service, with Gemini-Cancer ideas being implemented by dynamic Taurus III energies. Gemini-Cancers could handle development, day-to-day operations and public relations while Taurus III's were out drumming up sales. But they would regularly have to consult financial advice, an area in which their relationship would lack natural strengths.

Misunderstandings are likely in the family, where exuberant Taurus III's will tread on tender Gemini-Cancer feelings. They will also be apt to read Gemini-Cancer introspection as rejection, making them prickly and nervous.

ADVICE: Learn to compromise. Emulate each other's strengths. Work together when possible. Fulfill each other's dreams. Give many gifts.

Finding a Common Language

Problems of communication are central to this relationship. If these partners fail to learn to express their deeper and more complex needs, feelings and sensitivities, they may find little to hold them together and much to break them apart. Everything left unsaid builds until it explodes, aggressively and destructively. Not especially attracted to each other physically or romantically, Taurus III's and Cancer I's may have difficulty finding a common language, whether spoken or other. In certain family and work relationships, however, this lack of subjective response can actually support constructive communication.

Love and marriage will rarely prove fertile ground for this relationship. In exceptional cases, however, the Cancer I talent for empathy will gel with Taurus III human sympathy to create an atmosphere of emotional support and respect. Friendships are possible here, but they may be highly complex: when Cancer I's get bottled up inside, there is usually little anyone can do to help, and they may become envious of Taurus III extroversion and social skills. Taurus III's, meanwhile, may be brought down from their enthusiastic highs by Cancer I criticism, sarcasm and refusal to be motivated by their own natural energies. Taurus III's are subject to agonizing depressions, and it will be easy for them to blame such states on their Cancer I friends.

The obligatory day-to-day interactions and shared experiences of parent-child and sibling matchups may lead to improved communication, and there may also be hard-to-define genetic connections. Yet these two can still seem as different as night and day, and others will wonder how they became incarnate in the same family group. Working out such differences may be precisely the task that this lifetime holds for them, however, making their relationship a crucial learning process, with acceptance and understanding being the important lessons.

Work relationships here may be effective and efficient, especially if there is little personal contact. Objective skills, ranging from financial to technical, will make this pair a valuable asset to any company. Their differences may coalesce effectively in implementing projects, making their relationship much stronger than the sum of their strengths.

ADVICE: Working out differences is the name of the game. Learn from each other. Cultivate understanding. Use objective strengths. Be sympathetic.

Visionary Energy

This relationship can brew up some fantastic visions. Its grand, even gigantic ideas and plans represent a meeting of two separate, vivid fantasy worlds that can produce amazing results—if they are in synch. Alas, relatively few of these dreams come to fruition, and indeed most can be highly unrealistic. Yet their originality and imaginative content are memorable.

These two are capable of close friendships that can develop into love affairs and marriages. Quiet or hidden Cancer II's will often be fascinated by colorful, flamboyant Taurus III's, who perhaps mirror their own secret desire to be more extroverted. Cancer II's can become obsessed with the wishes of Taurus III's, who may in turn come to acknowledge them and help them to unlock their hidden visions. In the relationships formed in such cases, fantasy and dreams will blossom, encouraging intimate enjoyment and exciting projects in the shape of a full-blown romance.

Should the result be marriage or a permanent living situation, whether between friends or lovers, the most extraordinary domestic space can be created in which these two will be liberated to externalize their fantasies without fear of failure or rejection. Such a space can be a laboratory for social or artistic forays into the world, but also a sanctuary to retreat to when an unappreciative public creates disappointments. Marriages can be rich and full, but Taurus III–Cancer II parents who are considered quirky or far out by their more practical children or family members must be careful themselves not to reject their family's views and feelings.

The visionary energy of siblings or co-workers in this combination will not be easy for a family or company to deal with on a daily basis. If these two undermine practical endeavors, they will be counterproductive to the best interests of the group. Occasionally, such a family or business may decide to follow the dreams and longings of the Taurus III–Cancer II pair, only to meet with disappointment. After such a failure, it will be difficult for them to make others take their ideas seriously again.

ADVICE: Keep in touch with reality as well as with fantasy. Fewer expectations may produce fewer failures. Learn to handle disappointment. Stay strong.

Fueling the Motor

This combination heightens its partners' ambition and aims to transcend all limitations, generally through the avenues of public life or career. These two want to go somewhere, and they want others to see them do it. Engaging in something bigger than you are can bring out feelings of inadequacy, however, which this relationship will magnify—both these personalities can overreact to insecurity. And unless they are shooting for the same goal, and are committed to being a team, their insecurities will pit them against each other: as soon as one person gets ahead, the other will be jealous, frustrated and angry.

Love and marriage here are problematic. Cancer III's are content alone, and if they do look for a partner, they will want someone stable and dependable. They may disapprove of or reject Taurus III wildness, and Taurus III financial irresponsibility can drive them up the wall. With Taurus III's requiring more freedom and Cancer III's more commitment, there may be a stalemate or breakdown here. And Cancer III's who feel insecure about their partners may respond by trying to manipulate or dominate them, Taurus III's by flooding them with charm; either of these reactions is likely to arouse further insecurity and resistance.

Friendships, particularly nondemanding ones, can be excellent here. A love of spiritual or environmental subjects may feature. These two will share without fear of censure; Taurus III's can stimulate Cancer III imagination, and Cancer III's can help teach Taurus III's about responsibility.

As colleagues, these two may be uncomfortably competitive. This will stimulate the quantity and quality of their work, but there is a danger that they will behave somewhat underhandedly or at least unhelpfully. Should they find themselves at the top of the heap, however, they may have to bury the hatchet, at least temporarily, to keep the business afloat. A solid partnership between them can achieve a lot. Antagonisms can also emerge in the family sphere, especially between opposite-sex pairs of siblings or cousins. But the ruckus these pairs raise usually sounds worse than it is, and their relationships may evolve into lasting and mature ones.

ADVICE: Recognize insecurity and keep it in check. Don't let the tail wag the dog. Mute dissension. Preserve group tranquillity. Develop spiritually.

THE CUSP OF OSCILLATION

Shiva the Mascot

On-again-off-again, high-low, excess-lack—bipolar behavior is characteristic of this relationship, which is apt to have few dull moments. Indeed it may reinforce each personality's dark side, producing exciting and at times destructive behavior. Destruction, however, is very much part of the creative process, and in this respect Shiva, the Hindu god of creation and destruction, might be the relationship's mascot. Should Cancer-Leos want someone to provide a peaceful environment and to balance their contrasting moods, it is unlikely to be a Taurus III; these two are much more likely to bring out each other's wild sides and mood swings.

Love and family relationships will stir deep emotions, sudden passionate outbursts and expressions of undying love or hate. If hatred is in play, it may smolder quietly and go unnoticed for long periods before erupting, or be reflected by moods of disinterest or neglect masked by the appearance of toleration. Yet these two may be afraid of letting go, afraid of seeing everything fly apart. This fear often fixes such behavior, making suppressed anger difficult to dislodge.

Friendships and marriages may be much more satisfying. Busy with adventure, vigorous sports and other physically challenging activities, such relationships will have their emotional ups and downs, but these are usually subordinated to exciting confrontations that paradoxically provide a measure of stability—they let off steam. The positive attitudes and innovative approaches of Taurus III's will counter Cancer-Leos' tendency to get emotionally blocked, sweeping them out of their depressions. Taurus III's will benefit from being appreciated for such active stances. For these two to have children together will satisfy Shiva's lust for reproduction and stimulate creativity. When these two are co-workers or partners, they are only likely to achieve success if the Taurus III has the patience and interest to work unflinchingly side-by-side with the Cancer-Leo. But the Taurus III will probably lack the psychological understanding that Cancer-Leos need.

ADVICE: Being bored is no crime. Cultivate more peaceful moments. Practice meditation or yoga. Center yourself in the here and now.

A Private Enchantment

The Taurus III–Leo I mix can generate a strange sort of enchantment, even a kind of glitz, in which admiration of serious principles and sensuous enjoyment hedonistically combine. The serious side of Leo I's is likely to cast a shadow over the relationship, but this is by no means a one-sided matchup, for Taurus III energies provide a counterweight of enjoyment and fun. This unusual combination lets Leo I's relax and Taurus III's focus. Although both of its participants are ordinarily extroverted, its mystery is such that they are inclined to keep the magic between them private rather than place it on view. Yet its shine will be apparent to all.

Love affairs between these two are highly unconventional. As unattached lovers they rarely hit it off, but Leo I's who are already married or committed may quite possibly seek excitement, adventure and romance with a Taurus III outside their primary relationship. Taurus III's are unlikely to withdraw from such encounters out of fear; in fact their unconventionality and unrepressed natural instincts will often be stimulated by Leo I advances or availability. Such relationships can go on quite pleasurably for years without the world being much the wiser.

Friendships here are rarely of the sharing variety, and have a limited depth of contact. Partaking of this relationship's strange mixture of seriousness and pleasure, these two can share fun times together. They never sacrifice enough of their strong egos, however, to build a lasting and meaningful friendship.

Marriages, parent-child and working relationships are likely to be dominated by the clash of authoritarian and rebellious attitudes. Taurus III's will feel Leo I authority, no matter how muted or subtle, as a repressive force, and will want to be allowed to be what they are without criticism or censure. Although Leo I parents, bosses or spouses will reward Taurus III children, employees or mates fairly for jobs well done, they are unlikely to show any more kindness or understanding than that. Thus Taurus III's are likely to resent them, seeing their attitudes as inhuman and at times unnatural.

ADVICE: Limit judgmental attitudes and rebelliousness. Share whenever possible. Sacrifice may be necessary. Beware of hurting others.

THE WEEK OF BALANCED STRENGTH

Granting Guidance

The challenge of this relationship is adopting rules, or at the very least a recognizable structure, to provide guidance in everyday life. Once such a system is agreed upon (which may take weeks, months or even years), the relationship can move forward constructively. Until then, it is likely to drift according to whichever way the winds of desire are blowing, and is unlikely to drop anchor in a safe haven.

In love relationships Leo II's tend to be long-suffering. Also, where Taurus III's may be out the door in short order when things go wrong, Leo II's blame themselves. Love affairs between these two, then, may well end with a grieving Leo II and a damaged but quickly mending Taurus III on the loose. When things go well, on the other hand, the relationship can be highly rewarding in physical terms, and although sexual encounters tend to bring out power struggles, their pleasure is often proportional to their degree of conflict. And when passions have cooled, it may sometimes be possible for kindness, sympathy and true feelings of love to be expressed.

Leo II's need to lighten up and have fun, and in friendships and marriages Taurus III's can prove just right for them. This pair can recognize boundaries and still have a great time, whether in conversation or in some entertaining activity. Needing little group contact or large-scale social interaction, the relationship will admit only a very few friends or married couples to its circle, and if these drop out of the picture they are unlikely to be replaced easily, if at all.

Family and work relationships will benefit from structural hierarchies, where it is abundantly clear what is permitted and what is not. Whether as siblings or co-workers, Taurus III's and Leo II's have the capacity to pull together and make a dynamic team. But a Taurus III employee or child may find a Leo II boss or parent highly unsympathetic at times, and capable of a stony and forbidding silence.

ADVICE: Hang in there, but also know when to give up. Agree on common rules. Keep up your end of the bargain. Stay open to outside influences.

THE WEEK OF LEADERSHIP
LEO III

No Guarantees

Conventional astrology correctly predicts a rough ride in this relationship because of a fixed and square orientation (these partners lie 90° apart in the zodiac; Leo and Taurus are fixed signs). The key concept here is empathy, but although the partners understand each other's feelings, there is no guarantee that they will be sympathetic to, honor or even pay attention to them; an aggression, even anger, is dormant in the relationship. This is, in fact, a curious combination of empathy and selfishness, so that the partners can be quite unfeeling and even ruthless toward each other, and also in dealing with other people.

Usually far more flexible than Leo III's, in this relationship Taurus III's are generally the ones most able to adapt and compromise. In love and family relationships, however, they may have no interest at all in doing so. When disputes arise between lovers, parents and children, or siblings in this combination, for example, Taurus III's are quite capable of soothing the savage Leo III lion or lioness, but will do so only when they want to, even though it is actually in their interest to do so. In addition, since Leo III's are not only normally leaders but tend to be very giving in relationships, virtually doting on those they love or are close to, this particular relationship may end up being directed—not necessarily very rationally—by the Taurus III, who will manipulate predictable Leo III attitudes.

In friendship, Leo III's are quite loyal but may not have enough interest in the Taurus III's activities to share them. These two are likely to be mutually supportive in times of distress, but not necessarily attentive to each other's needs during busy or successful periods. Their bonds will stay intact, however, and even when physically distant they will keep their lines of communication open through use of telephone, mail and fax.

At work, these two are often too reactive to each other's moods to make effective partners or co-workers. If they are friends or spouses, their careers are better kept separated.

ADVICE: Try to be sympathetic as well as empathic. Show that you care. Be kinder and less selfish. Beware of insensitivity. Pay attention.

THE CUSP OF EXPOSURE

A Demand for Openness

This combination asks its partners to keep their feelings and attitudes frank and open rather than hidden and suppressed. A relationship that makes natural and unaffected behavior its main requirement would seem pleasant enough, but this is precisely the area where most Leo-Virgos have problems, and they may sometimes see the relationship as tyrannical or insensitive to them. They are apt to retaliate by ferreting out the insecurities of the Taurus III, who will in turn find the relationship uncomfortable. In the long run, however, Leo-Virgos usually soften in their resentment as they lose their inhibitions, while Taurus III's enjoy the structure that the relationship imposes.

In love and at work, Leo-Virgos want the option of hiding or revealing. The pressure to be open all the time will make them frustrated, and they may envy the easier attitudes of the Taurus III. Likewise, when deprived of the ability to reveal themselves dramatically, whether physically, emotionally or spiritually, at moments of their own choosing, they feel disempowered and curiously deadened by the sameness of a boring (albeit natural) routine. The relationship's denial of choice is likely to make them rebellious and perverse.

The dominance of Taurus III's, or more correctly of their belief in the direct approach, will be strongly felt in their friendships and marriages with Leo-Virgos, who may, once again, come to feel insecure about their ability to meet the demand to be natural and open. They may also come to hate themselves for being closed and secretive. This conflict is not only harmful but unnecessary: in striving to be themselves (maybe against the current of the relationship), Leo-Virgos will become stronger, and will also influence their partners by demonstrating the value of intimacy. If a balance is reached between introversion and extroversion, a calmer, more balanced state may result. Sympathetic and lively Taurus III parents and siblings will have a healthy effect on moody Leo-Virgo children and brothers or sisters. Conversely, the twists and turns of the Leo-Virgo character will fascinate curious Taurus III's, waking them up to their own hidden fantasies and desires.

Being Silly

At its best, this relationship is fun, expressing a certain zaniness and a great deal of humor, but this is not the kind of humor one would expect from these two. Together they have a pointedly observational approach to human interaction, and a dry and compassionate wit—they laugh with people, not at them. This can be very entertaining for them; their relationship takes them out of their ordinary selves. Taurus III's, while natural, are always a bit self-important, while Virgo I's are a little rigid. The greatest gift this relationship can give them is the ability to laugh at themselves and at each other.

These two are in many ways opposites—Taurus III more free-flowing, Virgo I demanding structure—but they can accommodate each other, often through unconventional solutions. The lives of Taurus III's have a kind of entropy, a natural tendency to disorder, which is precisely what Virgo I's need a bit of in their somewhat rigid lives. In fact Virgo I sternness and inflexibility may be a defense against unconscious fears of disorder. Through trust, understanding and perhaps love, a Taurus III can inspire a Virgo I to be a more complete person.

Service-oriented Virgo I's may benefit from love and family matchups with Taurus III's, who are independent and may give them something of a rest. Taurus III spontaneity will be somewhat exasperating for Virgo I's, but it will also perk them up, energizing them and pushing them out of depression. Friendship is probably the best relationship for this process. Here Virgo I's will appreciate Taurus III naturalness, and the pair will be able to relax and have fun. Little will be out of bounds here—to be silly, goofy or crazy for a while will be valued rather than criticized. More "serious" relationships—work pairings, marriages, love affairs—may involve expectations that make it difficult for either partner to be himself. Virgo I's are likely to be emotionally demanding yet unable to give, while Taurus III's will feel judged for their sloppy behavior. Parent-child and teacher-student relationships may also go in this direction.

ADVICE: Beware of laying on expectations. Self-fulfilling prophecies do come true. Learn what others have to teach. Put energies to work efficiently. Laugh at yourselves.

THE WEEK OF THE ENIGMA
VIRGO II

The Best Person

Responsibility is the keyword of this combination, but it is of a rather uncustomary type. The emphasis here is on responsibility less to others than to oneself, and in particular to one's self-development, perhaps in a spiritual or moral sense. The relationship may have a single principal slogan, which is "Be the very best person you can be." In pursuing such a path of self-expansion, this pairing demands determination.

Friendships and love affairs can be extremely close here. They often begin with an aggressive or curious Taurus III hanging around and hoping to be noticed by an attractive but shy Virgo II—who, however, will almost always give a signal that some further advance would be appreciated. Once the pair have acknowledged their mutual interest, things can move quickly toward intimacy. Taurus III's have an interesting way of ignoring the defenses of Virgo II's and going right to the heart of their personalities. These two may share a sense of fantasy and of comedy, but the Virgo II tendency to withdraw emotionally will periodically frustrate Taurus III's, especially when it occurs during intimate moments. Taurus III's can go far, however, in convincing their partner of the need to be truly present and honestly involved.

In marriages and work relationships, the idea of self-development and personal achievement is extremely strong. Both partners will benefit from the relationship's self-actualizing orientation, but they will also be there for each other in times of need. Thus while both will be able to progress on their individual developmental and spiritual path, their partnership, relative to a family or company, will also evolve and grow in stature.

Family relationships here are more problematic. Responsibility in this context can have the meaning more of discharging duties and doing chores than of improving oneself. Parent-child or grandparent-child relationships of either combination as well as siblings relationships with a wide age-spread can tend to be bossy, demanding and critical.

ADVICE: Continue on your path. Stress self-development but grow together as well. Lessen critical attitudes. Seek spiritual goals. Roll back frontiers.

THE WEEK OF THE LITERALIST
VIRGO III

The Fine Art of Persuasion

This relationship can elevate the art of persuasion to a high level indeed—but in attempting mastery of this ability, these two are usually more successful in convincing other people than each other. Each partner exerts extremely subtle forms of manipulation to nudge the other in the desired direction, yet both are usually quite aware of what's going on. Their manipulations may involve emotional blackmail ("I love you"), bribery ("That would make me love you") or disguised threats ("Maybe I don't love you"), in addition to devices like simply withdrawing affection or attention; rarely, however, will such behavior get out of hand or appear ugly or threatening, so skillfully is it employed. Taurus III's and Virgo III's are definitely individuals who know what they want, so the issue becomes perfecting the skill of getting it from each other.

Those on the outside of such a friendship, marriage or family tie may not even see what's going on, mistaking a dynamic process of give-and-take for harmony or agreement. This may be part of this pair's ability to be so influential with other people: by convincing them of the relationship's honesty, health and good feeling, they can effectively mesmerize them into cooperating. Taurus III–Virgo III friends, siblings and spouses may be sought out by others who are already prepared to be convinced when they come seeking ideas or advice.

Love relationships are notoriously manipulative endeavors, but the Taurus III–Virgo III relationship is curiously more honest than most. Once the relationship's romantic phase has settled into a more day-to-day pattern, persuasion and manipulation will no longer be so powerfully highlighted. Indeed the goal of a truly honest love relationship here will be to phase these behaviors out altogether, usually in a conscious and dedicated way.

In work relationships, such persuasiveness is only of limited value, even at the executive level. Sooner or later pragmatic results, such as sales, productivity, cost margins and simple bookkeeping, will reveal any unsavory truths that cannot be easily explained away.

ADVICE: Let others make up their minds. Never manipulate a manipulator. Be less selfish and more giving. Convincing becomes unconvincing.

THE CUSP OF BEAUTY
VIRGO-LIBRA CUSP

A Desire to Surrender

This highly imaginative relationship is apt to be concerned with the pursuit of beauty and sensuousness. The danger is that living in a pleasurable and fantastic world will become intoxicating, making the parties submit to dominance from each other, or from anything—like drugs, sex or music—designed to prolong pleasure and fuel highs. Addictions here may get out of hand, and with them the ability to keep in touch with daily realities. Giving themselves over to their pursuits, these partners risk ignoring the feelings of others (including their parents, children, other friends, teachers and co-workers) in the all-consuming drive to satisfy ever-increasing needs.

Love relationships and friendships here are particularly prone to emotional dependencies and addictions. Craving only each other, these two may require more and more attention or love, ultimately becoming unable to do without them, and even suffering physical symptoms when they are withdrawn. The theme of beauty is characteristic here: the partners long for it, and want to surrender to it. Indeed the relationship requires that they sacrifice their egos on the altar of beauty, whether real or imagined, and whether belonging to the partners themselves or to some external source (painting, sound, taste or even drug-induced states of intoxication). The ultimate here is to merge with such beauty, and to leave the world's cares behind.

Such escapism is usually tempered in marriages and working relationships, which would otherwise be impossible to carry on. Even so, however, this kind of longing is likely to cause periodic breakdowns in these practical settings, with confusion, unhappiness and breakup often being the result.

Parent-child relationships are unlikely to go to the extremes of love affairs. Here imagination is often put to more positive ends, and the pair may show deep sympathy and understanding. Sibling relationships, especially of the opposite sex, can go too far in sharing intimate states based on fantasy, and may exhibit unrealistic or incestuous behavior.

ADVICE: Get a handle on your desires. Beware of addictive behavior. Try to balance fantasy and reality in everyday life. Don't isolate yourself.

THE WEEK OF THE PERFECTIONIST
LIBRA I

Stress Buildup

This relationship is unlikely to achieve much stability. Its critical attitudes and resentments are usually too intense to afford much rest. These two have extremely different attitudes to things, in particular in their approach to all matters physical, and one would expect them to have issues in that arena. Furthermore, Libra I's feel the need to improve their Taurus III partners, placing tremendous expectations on them which they are neither willing nor able to meet. Because Libra I's lack the ability to leave them alone, Taurus III's will in most cases either fight back, withdraw or break off the relationship.

Taurus III's have a lot to contribute to love affairs with Libra I's, especially in helping them to relax. The open Taurus III attitude to sex will teach appreciative Libra I's quite a lot, providing a stimulating and rewarding outlet to daily stress. Affection and sympathy can also be expressed in this relationship, deepening its levels of trust and acceptance.

In marriage, personal pressures will probably be too much to bear. Taurus III's usually return fire when criticized, and may accuse a Libra I of a drive for perfection that makes the relationship artificial, disconnecting it from natural feelings, thoughts and actions. The Libra I use of checklists to monitor the pair's activities, ranging from financial to sexual, is likely to become intolerable to Taurus III's.

Friendships can be still more problematic. Although these partners relate well enough, they may have little time to spend together, unless one special project captures their mutual imagination. Also, selfish attitudes are likely to deprive them of each other's help in times of need, and over the years they are likely just to drift apart. The same may happen in family ties. Working relationships in this combination may be quite satisfactory, as long as the partners' unit of co-workers or business associates is protected from too much stress or strict deadlines. These two have a tendency to be too relaxed at times, perhaps due to their shared venusian influence (Venus rules both Taurus and Libra), which promotes enjoyment and satisfaction with the status quo, and encourages procrastination.

ADVICE: Tear up your checklist. Try to act more naturally, with fewer expectations. Be there in times of need. Strengthen family ties.

THE WEEK OF SOCIETY

Sparkling Thought

Stimulating ideas and strong feelings are likely to figure in this sparkling relationship, bringing this pair into action on the side of service groups and organizations. Areas of interest may be energy management, environmental concerns and society's response to them, and quality-of-life and freedom issues. The relationship has a strong orientation toward thought, especially of an idealistic or theoretical kind. Grounding such mental activity in the physical sphere will support the relationship, removing it from what could otherwise be idle fantasy and speculation.

Unless these two form strong bonds based on shared pursuits and interests, they are likely to blow hot and cold in love and marriage, and their relationships of this kind will often be subject to the instabilities of fluctuating emotions. Too often, fears and insecurities emerging in both Taurus III's and Libra II's will threaten the structure of the relationship. Neither party rates high in self-awareness in matters of love, and the relationship will often trigger Libra II irritation and depression and Taurus III volatility. Seeking stability in religious, psychological or spiritual pursuits, perhaps in the form of worship, workshops or therapy, can be helpful here.

Family relationships in this combination may exhibit a high degree of personal self-satisfaction, even smugness. The danger here is that an elitist, superior attitude will emerge, with the duo basking in its own supposed mental or social excellence. Parent-parent, parent-child or sibling matchups in this combination may foster such attitudes, resulting in stagnation and unrealistic outlooks.

Friendships and work combinations are favored here. They will usually emphasize projects and activities that demand a high degree of involvement. It is also possible that friends may engage in business or social endeavors and, vice versa, that co-workers and partners can form very close friendships. Perhaps the best combination here would be working in service of an environmentally aware company that is financially successful but pays strict attention to the needs and best interests of human society and of planet Earth.

ADVICE: Cultivate personal as well as social awareness. Encourage spiritual activities. Beware of conceit. Don't get tied up in idle thoughts.

Wanted: A Boss

The most difficult issue to be addressed in this relationship, and the most essential, is who will shoulder what responsibility. These two must decide which of them will be the authority, and in what areas, and what standards are set. Without this focus, the relationship will probably fly apart, if it was ever much together in the first place. The problem is that neither of these two is very rocklike, despite the capable face they may present to the world. Undependability, disinterest, procrastination, neglect—all of these and more are likely to add to the problems here.

Passions may soar in love—and then just as quickly fade. A Taurus III looking for something deep may instead find a Libra III just out for a fling. Oh well, no matter. Taurus III's are resilient enough to bounce back from such disappointments, and to look again—or not.

Marriages are likely to be problematic unless an outlet can be found for their flamboyant and dramatic emotions. Should these be repressed, or go unrecognized, expect frustration and constant argument. Eventually a reliable source of authority will have to be set up, particularly if the couple has children. Libra III's have a finely honed sense of style, while Taurus III's are more natural and "let it all hang out"; in marriage, these two will need to agree upon the lifestyle they adopt.

Friendships may suffer from lack of focus and authority. One would not expect these two to become bosom buddies, neither of them being willing to give up much for the relationship. Perhaps acquaintanceships, sports or social partnerships, or career connections as colleagues are more desirable. Both of these partners are ambitious, and should they rise to an organization's upper levels, they may become friendly associates who occasionally see each other socially. This may also be true of co-workers within an office. In family relationships in this combination, a parent or grandparent will assert their authority. In most cases, this provision of structure and rules will not be harmful, and may in fact be required by more chaotic Taurus III's and Libra III's.

ADVICE: Accepting authority is imperative. Insecurities will be eased by accepting rules. Acknowledge boundaries. Vent your feelings.

THE CUSP OF DRAMA & CRITICISM
LIBRA-SCORPIO CUSP

Realms of the Mind

These two relate well to each other's youthful and wild side. In their relationship with each other, neither partner is looking for problems, although intellectual arguments are likely to arise. Quick-witted repartee may be prominent here, with irony, sarcasm and sharp humor abounding, but it is usually well meant and truly funny. Deeper and more passionate or serious relationships are generally not encouraged by this combination, which instead nurtures rather easygoing and pleasant ones.

Although friendships and love relationships are both favored here, marriages or more permanent living situations will often result from them. A friendship or love affair may in hindsight be seen as having been a proving ground from which a deeper commitment has evolved, but such relationships have great value in themselves, and are usually free of such expectations. Taurus III friends and lovers take great pride in the mental abilities of their Libra-Scorpio partners, who for their part admire the natural ease of Taurus III's. This relationship has much to teach its partners: Libra-Scorpios learn how to relax, Taurus III's how to focus their thoughts more effectively. Whatever the physical attractions here, the primary thrust of these relationships is not necessarily sexual or emotional but usually lies in the realms of the mind.

Marriages and business relationships both benefit and suffer from the combination's easy attitudes, which may undercut ambitions and dilute dynamic drives but can actually result in higher productivity and fewer losses due to argument and stress, especially in marriage. A common love of aesthetic matters may also serve to unite these two. Family relationships, particularly between siblings and cousins, can be great fun, and may evolve into the most important of all this pair's life attachments. From the earliest age, such relationships may demonstrate both precocity and easy interaction. Whether such siblings or cousins decide to run a business, share living space or just take occasional vacations together in adult life, their bonds are rarely broken and require little more than a call, letter or visit to keep them alive.

ADVICE: Don't let sarcasm dominate. Don't let easy attitudes undercut your drive. Don't get bottled up in your head. Show you care, regularly.

THE WEEK OF INTENSITY
SCORPIO I

Strength in Difference

This relationship aims to achieve a balance among the differing orientations and strengths of its partners, whom it encourages to find the middle ground, teaching them a lot about tempering their impulses. This, of course, does not come easily at first. Luckily, fidelity and patience are built into the relationship, which is quite long-sighted and provides the support for working out whatever may come along.

Taurus III's and Scorpio I's have much to learn from each other. Scorpio I's, for example, are naturally able to control their emotions, while Taurus III's are more gifted in expressing them; thus the challenge for more repressed Scorpio I's is to get their feelings out, whereas for more flamboyant Taurus III's it is to keep them under control. Intense Scorpio I's can also learn from the laid-back nature of Taurus III's, who for their part would do well to mirror some of Scorpio I's determination in the face of adversity. In these and other ways, the talents of one of these partners may closely correspond to the challenges and needs of the other.

Although Taurus III's are ruled by earth and Scorpio I's by water, connoting sensation and feelings, respectively, their relationship is governed by the element of fire, which is associated with intuition. Thus their love affairs tend to be exciting, passionate (sexual rather than sensual) and impulsive. As they lose themselves in ecstatic experiences that transcend both sensation and feeling, their love can soar to the heavens—but, like fire, it can also be consuming and dangerous. Balance is essential here if burnout, flare-ups of jealousy, and even hatred during or after an unpleasant breakup are to be avoided.

In friendship and marriage these two make a strong combination. They often like or even admire each other, and can learn a great deal from one another's approaches to life. Even when they come from different backgrounds and lifestyles, they see the merits—and also the deficiencies—of each other's attitudes. As friends and spouses they can make a good team, applying their complementary strengths to both business enterprises and artistic endeavors.

ADVICE: Seek the moderate approach. Learn from each other's talents. Compromise is not a sign of weakness. Energies are not unlimited.

SCORPIO II

Acceptance Without Reservation

The deep, almost heavy emotions in this relationship can be lightened and even resolved, leading the partners away from the deeper wells of feeling to the airier realms of thought. The combination's objectivity and capacity for acceptance goes far in permitting the partners periodically to detach from one another and process whatever may be going on emotionally between them, no matter how profound or difficult. People often ignore the fun-loving side of Scorpio II's, emphasizing their sexual expressiveness, seriousness and need for control, but Taurus III's often provide the humor necessary to pry them from their darker moods. Taurus III's themselves are often conflicted, lacking the tools to sort through their feelings; proximity to the profound understanding of Scorpio II's will help them toward greater self-awareness.

Taurus III–Scorpio II love relationships magnify the physicality of both partners, and can be torrid and wrenchingly passionate. The need for detachment is acute here, and indeed these lovers are often able to objectify and discuss their problems. Although these affairs are often short-lived, they are memorable.

Marriages and friendships often begin more casually, growing out of chance meetings or quite ordinary circumstances. The pair may meet each other at social gatherings, at clubs or fitness centers, while traveling or through a mutual friend. (The connection rarely clicks, however, when effected through matchmakers or planned introductions at parties or dinners.) The partners' nurturing abilities meld well, making them sympathetic parents, or else effective caretakers of pets. Accepting each other without reservation becomes an important goal, which is tested through daily interaction. Scorpio II's can suffer deeply from the loss of a Taurus III family member, whether a parent, grandparent or sibling. They will see such an event as a tragedy, particularly since the Taurus III may have proved tremendously and perhaps uniquely sympathetic and understanding to them. When these two are co-workers and colleagues, Scorpio II faithfulness and dogged dedication can meld well with Taurus III physical energies.

ADVICE: Develop nurturing attitudes. Have fun in all aspects of life. Understanding comes through acceptance. Hard work pays off.

Taking the Lead

Issues swirl and dance in this volatile relationship, vying for ascendancy. But the overall themes are those of leadership and ego: these partners will surely fight over which of them will lead in what areas, and whose ego will receive the most stroking. A good rule of thumb is that whoever is least open about this goal wants it most, making this a difficult beast to fight. Tension and struggle, however, can lead to great lessons in release and acceptance.

The tension may also be resolved if the partners, as a couple, adopt a tone or role of leadership in relation to those around them. In fact their whole style can take on a royal demeanor—granting audiences and favors to friends, making dramatic entrances and exits, and generally encouraging a kind of glow or buzz around themselves. As they build up a mythology about their pairing, they can start to believe it themselves. Fortunately or unfortunately, the relationship's inner turmoil will bring them down to earth as some of their own more unsavory characteristics emerge, reminding them that they are mere mortals.

Adventurous Taurus III's are likely to lead in friendships and love affairs. They have a great deal to teach more reclusive Scorpio III's. In marriage, however, these two operate differently, with Scorpio III's taking the lead in household matters and Taurus III's following and complementing.

Taurus III and Scorpio III are exactly opposite each other astrologically (180° apart in the zodiac), and both Taurus and Scorpio are fixed signs. Their relationship can feature great tension, then, but also great endurance and solidity. This polarity may appear most typically in parent-child relationships: Scorpio III's fit best in the parental role, and natural responses and feelings will predominate in Taurus III children. At work, Scorpio III bosses and Taurus III employees can combine effectively, Scorpio III's being directed, generous and considerate while Taurus III's are energetic and dedicated in fulfilling their assignments.

Elaborate Masquerade

This relationship can bring out sides of both partners that are generally hidden from view, in particular the kind of unpredictable wildness or love of freedom that they share. The relationship puts great value on emotional honesty and openness, but while it encourages the partners to reveal themselves, they simultaneously fear rejection. A complex dynamic emerges, which ideally ends in acceptance—the best-case scenario for this relationship is when its partners feel free to be themselves, even to be wild, and are accepted for it. The worst situation imaginable for them is when they feel constantly forced to hide, for fear of being rejected or found out.

In love and marriage, of course, such issues surface regularly. The sticking points are often issues of truthfulness and fidelity raised by involvements with other people. Honesty can be difficult here, since the partners fear hurting each other, and also fear being either controlled or rejected. Yet they also tend to want to reveal their involvements, and although such revelation can lead to scenes and threats of breakup, in the long run it can also bring increased understanding and openness. Part of the secret to getting along here is to be honest in the small areas of daily life. A pattern of lying or deception in apparently trivial matters may become a nasty habit that pervades almost any part of the relationship, big or small.

Friendships in this combination are often less threatening and challenging. Being able to relax together, however, is no guarantee of more truthful or open attitudes. A great deal can be hidden here, and subtle forms of disingenuousness may manifest and undermine the relationship. When crises arise, or when one partner makes greater demands in a time of need, such friendships can collapse like a house of cards.

Working and family relationships are usually aggravated by negative emotions, especially mistrust and fear. Through a curious inability to be honest about responsibilities, personal efforts and goals, Taurus III's and Scorpio-Sagittarians may create doubt and anxiety in each other, and share in quite an elaborate masquerade.

ADVICE: Promote honesty. Discover your mechanisms of self-deception. Allow privacy and foster trust. Drop game-playing. See through the mask.

Devoted Friends

The highlight of this combination is each partner's sensitivity to the other's needs. Responsive in nature, the relationship often demonstrates deeply understanding and giving attitudes. It is usually more extroverted than introverted, as a full slate of vigorous physical activities can attest. This combination encourages exploration and is characterized by a hunger for experience. Both Sagittarius I's and Taurus III's are fond of travel, particularly to settings of natural beauty.

These two make splendid friends. They often seem as close as brother and sister, gaining a family-like familiarity that has the added attraction of lacking the friction common between siblings. They do compete, but usually in positive pursuits such as sports and games. Trying to work together may be difficult due to a lack of objectivity about the job at hand.

Taurus III-Sagittarius I love relationships can be physically intense but also affectionate. Indeed, just as friends in this combination resemble siblings, lovers resemble devoted friends, and show the kind of inner understanding customarily reserved for family members. Natural behavior is valued highly, and all forms of snobbism or pretension are condemned. The danger does exist of forming an isolating mutual-admiration society, and if these partners cut their ties with friends, family and co-workers, a bewildering situation can arise if the love affair fails or founders, since neither partner will have a support group.

The relationship sometimes follows a natural evolution from friendship to love affair, from love affair to life partnership. The final seal of marriage may be especially fulfilling, not only because the spouse is a known quantity but because the relationship is already so rich. Both of these personalities are extremely independent, however, and they may postpone final commitments, preferring to keep their freedom rather than risk losing what they have.

This pair's spirited and freedom-loving nature makes them less-than-ideal co-workers. They will undoubtedly encourage each other to procrastinate, and in business, their loafing will prove a drain.

ADVICE: Keep ties with family and friends intact. Beware of isolation. Don't be afraid of deeper commitments. Giving up some freedom may be worth it.

Mapping Uncharted Waters

The challenge here is to build an effective, even efficient relationship that can achieve worldly goals and interact meaningfully with others. Both partners are unconventional, and they may believe that worldly achievement is not their cup of tea. Actually, though, they need to own up to the fact that they want recognition, fulfillment and reward as much as the next person. Their relationship can help teach them how to work for these things.

One of the most gratifying things about this combination is that where others may attempt to correct and reform Taurus III's and Sagittarius II's, their relationship with each other usually shelters them from critical and judgmental attitudes. Each accepts the other's unusual, even bizarre side. Their relationship may be difficult for others to understand, but this will matter little to them, and may even prove a source of merriment.

The relationship activates the earth and fire elements in Taurus and Sagittarius respectively, and reinforces the corresponding faculties of sensation and intuition. Love and marriage can consequently be characterized by a passionate sensuality, with sex and sensuousness mingling pleasurably. A relationship that attains psychological and physical openness in a moderate and structured way, rather than a wild and chaotic one, will mitigate arguments, anger and other negative expressions. Friendships and family relationships, oddly enough, are not always so close. Although this relationship is protective of its partners' individuality, it must also make its way in a society more conservative and "straight" than it is itself; thus Taurus III's and Sagittarius II's friends and even siblings may spend relatively little time together.

In business pursuits, where some kind of structure is usually already made, Taurus III's and Sagittarius II's will do best in self-employment, perhaps as a duo or in a team that puts their unusual qualities to commercial use. Forced to learn bookkeeping, accounting and financial planning, the relationship will be forced to map uncharted waters and to eschew sloppiness in money matters.

ADVICE: Be yourself in the world. Get to know all kinds of people. Don't always consider yourself so strange. Normality need not be an affliction.

Tangible Goals of the Spirit

This relationship is often blessed with abundant energy and uplifting spirit. Its tendency is not only to soar into higher realms of thought but to plunge into profound depths of emotion. The emphasis is on the large line and the big picture, so that details often get overlooked. Believing in something is felt to be more important than thinking it is true; this sort of belief, however, is grounded in common sense and feelings.

As lovers, Taurus III's are strong enough to match this particular partner's desires. They tend to insist on deeply human values, however, while Sagittarius III's often get carried away with power and ego drives; as a consequence they are likely to feel unfulfilled and unsatisfied. For all the wrong reasons, Sagittarius III's may take this personally, and wind up feeling inadequate or unattractive. Marriages between these two are rarely recommended, for Taurus III's are likely to resent Sagittarius III attitudes, which most assuredly can arouse rebellion. Also, a quincunx position here (Sagittarius III and Taurus III are 150° apart in the zodiac) lends instability to this marital relationship, and augurs poorly for its future.

In friendships and family relationships, Sagittarius III's are again likely to dominate, usually in a protective way. Yet they may become quite dependent on Taurus III optimism and good spirits to keep them happy and free from depression, especially when these two are friends or siblings. These pairs can also become involved as equals in mutually uplifting spiritual pursuits in which they will relinquish their power struggles. The whole point of such activities, in fact, may be to teach this and other important lessons.

Working relationships between these two are likely to center around big projects of an artistic, social or religious and spiritual nature, often with Sagittarius III at the helm. As long as Taurus III's do not feel used or neglected, they can work well and enthusiastically as assistants to Sagittarius III's, moving toward tangible goals of the spirit. Their powers of persuasion meld well with forceful Sagittarius III leadership.

ADVICE: Don't take things personally. Let go of overbearing attitudes. Strive for equality. Pursue goals of the spirit. Learn life's important lessons.

Trapped in the Labyrinth

Things unseen seem to dominate this combination. Secrets, problems and fantasies are all felt as present here, yet the partners have no ability to get their hands on them or define them, much less deal with them. There is a kind of shroud hovering in the background, through which certain things can never be seen. This will obviously be a source of confusion, doubt and upset. If the pair can simply accept the mystery, however, without trying to analyze it, the relationship can be fairly fulfilling.

The more mysterious side of Sagittarius-Capricorns is activated by this relationship and threatens to dominate it. Taurus III's, often drawn to unusual individuals anyway, are strongly attracted to the passionate Sagittarius-Capricorn nature behind the inscrutable mask; they may be easily seduced by a Sagittarius-Capricorn, even away from a primary relationship, without realizing what they are getting into. Finally, trapped in a complex maze of emotions, they may find themselves at the mercy of their partner's powerful will.

This scenario is in no way inevitable in love affairs. Yet Taurus III's may indeed be at a loss to cope with a Sagittarius-Capricorn's emotions, particularly when these manifest in moods of stubbornness, frustration and depression. The positive Taurus III approach does not work with such partners, who must be left to work out their feelings without being prodded or pushed. The deepest desires are often stirred by these relationships, but idealistic Taurus III's must accept that their results are not necessarily positive. Marriages and friendships can center on appreciating and exploring nature. Gardening, domestic animals and pets may be interests here. If children are involved, nurturing activities often begin with the adults themselves, then extend to their progeny.

At work, misunderstandings within the relationship are likely to slow down or halt projects, resulting in counterproductive anger and frustration. Family relationships, especially parent-child ones, are deep and complex; these two can often understand each other far better than friends or lovers can. Mother-son and father-daughter relationships in this combination may be the determining factors in these individuals' lives.

ADVICE: Don't get in over your head. Maintain objectivity. Keep feelings under control. Nurture, but don't be possessive. Be more understanding.

Folie à Deux

This intimate relationship emphasizes privacy and discretion, isolating itself from the scrutiny of society. Its reclusiveness is not necessarily comfortable for either of its partners, both of whom need to be involved in the world; but the relationship can work if they are so outwardly directed outside the relationship that being alone together becomes a kind of peaceful retreat, a space for spirituality and renewal. After a hard day at the office, these two may seek each other out to share warmth and understanding.

Intimacy emerges most clearly in love, marriage and friendship. Taurus III-Capricorn I love affairs can be physically satisfying, sympathetic and supportive. Problems arise if Capricorn I's come to symbolize to Taurus III's the kinds of repressive forces that inevitably arouse their rebelliousness. Blaming and guilt trips may make things even more difficult. Capricorn I's need understanding, however, and their tendency to get bottled up inside may find relief in the arms of a nonjudgmental Taurus III. Should the latter finally decide to bail out, the Capricorn I will be left grieving over the loss of the relationship.

Intimacy may again be expected in marriage, but there is a danger that the couple's isolation will produce a folie à deux—a relationship based on delusional beliefs. Such a relationship can be destructive to its children, and also succeed in the family losing contact with friends, relatives and other social anchors.

Friendships in this combination can be split asunder by the insecurities of Taurus III's, which often spur them on to wild ambition. Capricorn I's, more content to find a niche and stay there, may be amazed at their antics and ultimately give up in despair.

Working and parent-child relationships between these two are seldom favorable. A Capricorn I boss's or parent's lack of sympathy for the spontaneity and naturalness of a Taurus III employee or child may produce dissatisfaction and rebellion. If the Taurus III is the boss or parent, he or she may prove too freewheeling, or too demanding of personal initiative, for structure-oriented Capricorn workers or offspring.

ADVICE: Keep in touch with reality. Beware of cutting social ties. Be intimate but not isolated. Deal with guilt trips and rebelliousness.

Crying Out to Be Solved

This relationship concerns itself with puzzles crying out to be solved. The solutions can be achieved in two ways: first, by manifesting form out of chaos—that is, by pulling disparate elements into a coherent whole. Second, enigmatic phenomena can be subjected to logical and literal testing to solve a problem. Both Taurus III's and Capricorn II's have far-ranging interests, from the scientific to the paranormal, from computers to new-age topics, from art to music. Taurus III's are generally much more open to esoteric ideas, while Capricorn II's are more hardheaded, and often require physical proof. Conflicts may develop between their two viewpoints, but this determined couple will not stop until they find their answers.

In love affairs, Capricorn II's tend to hang in there no matter what, reluctant to admit defeat. Taurus III's are more interested in freedom, and will be involved in the relationship only as long as they want to be—Capricorn II attempts to control or hold them usually won't work. When the couple are getting along, however, their relationship may be physically quite pleasurable. The further step of marriage is not recommended, though, unless the Taurus III is prepared to make a serious commitment.

This combination can be close, sympathetic and productive in a parent-child or sibling matchup as long as the Capricorn II can back off occasionally and accept the Taurus III's different approach to life. Interest in games and puzzles abounds. The partners may have fewer disputes in friendships, where they may be united in their interest in and acceptance of not only metaphysical phenomena but also unusual friends and lovers who may join them in such interests. Emotional sharing is likely to be less important here than the areas under study and discussion.

At work, Taurus III's tend to forge ahead enthusiastically, particularly when new theories or products are being developed or tested. Capricorn II's tend to be more reserved and careful. Within the relationship, each partner is critical and often disapproving of the other's approach.

ADVICE: Resolve conflicts between belief and logic. Accept differences in others. Claiming attitudes will not work. Never give up your freedom.

Dreaming Up New Schemes

This combination is a classic. Since Taurus III and Capricorn III form an easy earth-sign trine (Taurus and Capricorn are earth signs 120° apart in the zodiac), astrology correctly predicts a positive, relatively trouble-free relationship here. The focus is emotional, with positive expectations playing a large part. The relationship may also be highly philosophical, at the same time that it contains a great deal of technical expertise. Dreaming up new ideas and schemes has no negative connotations here, and such seeds may often find themselves dropped in fertile ground.

In love, marriage and family relationships, Capricorn III dominant attitudes don't necessarily provoke rebellion in Taurus III's, as might be expected. Capricorn III's often admire the physical ease of Taurus III's, who are quick to sense their approval. The strongly sensuous bond that can exist here will afford much pleasure to both partners. In fact the relationship is often enjoyable and easygoing in its attitudes. One danger is that of complacency, since these two may feel little need to move forward when the status quo has already given them so much pleasure. This is one of the few relationships in which Taurus III's can see the benefit of giving up their wildness and ambition, perhaps because they feel secure for the first time. Marriages, then, can work out extremely well here.

Working relationships, like friendships, may tend to drift and lack focus. Although these two have few problems getting along as co-workers and colleagues, they may lack the spirit and drive to go beyond just getting the job done. Likewise, as business partners or executives, they may be carried away by idle schemes, or, confidently feeling that things are going well, can wait too long before making the necessary decisions. Procrastination and accompanying delays are ever-present dangers to the company or business influenced by this duo.

ADVICE: The status quo may not be the best you are capable of. Push on. Test your limits. Ambition and aggression can be positive if they are well directed.

THE CUSP OF MYSTERY & IMAGINATION

Garden of Earthly Delights

Since both these partners can be so lively, outgoing, uninhibited and natural, this would seem to be a wonderful matchup. The relationship strongly magnifies their earthy side and emphasizes their sensuousness. Indeed its focus is often sensuous beauty, whether in cooking fine meals, decorating a house sumptuously or indulging in the delights of massage, baths or lovemaking.

Both excitement and harmony are likely to emerge in love affairs; emotions of the tearing and wrenching variety rarely feature here. This in no way diminishes the relationship's passion; it simply makes things more enjoyable and less fractious. There is also likely to be an overemphasis on more superficial values, such as those connoted by good looks (which may openly acknowledge their debt to cosmetics), stylish clothes and trendy hairstyles. Even so, a natural image will be preferred.

Marriages here are likely to be happy and harmonious, for the most part. There may be too much interest in external appearances—the neatness of children, say, and matters of interior decorating, especially furniture. There is an undeniable urge to keep up with the neighbors, and a spiffy car or two parked in the driveway is usually a must.

The Taurus III–Capricorn-Aquarius matchup probably does best in the area of friendship. Sharing challenging activities (often involving travel), whether exploratory or sporting in nature, is par for the course. Such friendships often begin at work; co-workers and colleagues in this combination will not mind spending the day together in work-related activities and then going out together occasionally in the evening or on a weekend. They often share hobbies and interests of an aesthetic nature, involving, say, music, fashion or design.

In family settings this pair can enliven any special event, and will also provide good humor on an everyday basis. There are distinct problems in keeping it under control, however, for its ebullience can become quite turbulent, disturbing the concentration and sensibilities of other family members.

ADVICE: Be aware of the values of others. Go a bit deeper in your approach to life. Enjoy beautiful things, but don't get hooked on them.

At the Forefront

This combination is often busy with new ideas. Tremendously inventive, it puts little stock in worn-out traditions or empty ceremonies unless they can be revived in a meaningful way. Looking toward the future is the duo's real forte—whether working in new media, innovative art or technology, groundbreaking fashion or avant-garde art, they will want to be at the forefront. While these two may brim with ideas, separately their inertia in putting these in motion may be difficult to overcome; together, however, their relationship gives them a bit of a boost over initial obstacles.

Love affairs between these two are more scintillating than sizzling—their strengths lie in the realms of thought and intuition rather than that of feeling. Fun out of bed is usually just as important as fun in it, and visiting clubs, entertaining friends, taking walks, going out to dinner or shows, or enjoying tv, books and other media at home are essential.

Taurus III–Aquarius I marriages have much to recommend them, particularly if children are involved. These children need not be the couple's own—nieces and nephews, and the children of friends, may be constant visitors, and adoption or working with disadvantaged young people is always a possibility.

Taurus III–Aquarius I sibling relationships can be quite stormy but also very rewarding. They will often resemble close friendships—and friendships, meanwhile, will have the naturalness of sibling ties. Maintaining balance in such friendships may be difficult, however, for they will recognize few boundaries, and excessive involvement can wear both partners down. These two often exacerbate each other's nervous side, creating serious instabilities. Excellent career opportunities may open up for these two as freelancers or owners of a company. Employees are usually happy to work under such forward-looking bosses, who are not only motivated by efficiency and progress—they can be expected to provide the most up-to-date equipment to make jobs easier—but like the workplace to be fun and interesting.

ADVICE: Tune in to other people's emotional states. Minimize frictions and irritations. Tradition has its value, too. Youth is no more valuable than age.

Neglecting Deeper Areas

In many respects this relationship would seem perfect, and indeed it may involve an insistence that things run smoothly or even flawlessly. At least on the surface, Taurus III's and Aquarius II's both have a natural approach to life, and eschew hassles and problems. Furthermore, they are not the types who need to control each other, and in fact they insist on others being themselves. This approach, however, can neglect deeper problems, difficulties and also opportunities for growth.

Love relationships can go satisfactorily assuming that there is a physical attraction. If not, these two may form friendships that include platonic, but no less meaningful, feelings of love. Boundaries between love and friendship are often blurred here, allowing movement from one state to the other. This process may in fact be a way of handling uncomfortable situations and feelings when they arise, rather than confronting such disturbances head-on and trying to solve them. Drugs and other escapes can also pose problems. It is important for both partners to recognize their dark side, and to acknowledge that a relationship's problems are also challenges that can help it to grow and deepen. Marriages show the relationship in a different light. These spouses are more concerned with activities, albeit pleasurable ones, that challenge them mentally and physically. Designing a beautiful and functional home, making money, raising children, engaging in competitive sports or bettering their own personal best are all stimulating aspects in this area. As depth of commitment grows, these two may also indulge in psychological exploration and spiritual growth.

As co-workers these two have high standards of professionalism and technical expertise, which generally guarantee their success. If they are not appreciated, however, the quality of their work may fall off, and they may even quit.

Family members in this combination, especially parents (or grandparents) and children, are highly appreciative of each other. There is a tendency to spoil here, however, and neglect of structure can sometimes breed sloppiness and, ultimately, lack of respect.

ADVICE: Dig a bit deeper. Easy attitudes are not always the most meaningful. Problems are opportunities. The exit door is rarely the answer.

Creative Play

This relationship is often immature but highly vital and enthusiastic. Because Taurus III and Aquarius III are in a fixed and square aspect (90° apart in the zodiac, both fixed signs), conventional astrology predicts stubborn conflict. Yet although confrontations can be expected between these volatile personalities, the bond in this relationship is usually quite strong. Both partners' feelings are triggered easily by criticism or disapproval, and their fight to be themselves and resist such attacks may become the relationship's main theme.

In love affairs and marriages, the question of acceptance is paramount. Once these two have really accepted each other at a deep level, tremendous things are possible, but constant irritation may be present until then. They have so much in common to build a relationship on, yet may find it difficult or impossible to get along on a daily basis. What's worse, the more passionate their feelings become, the more instability manifests, creating a situation in which desire may ultimately threaten the relationship's very existence. Furthermore, these partners share a taste for sexual freedom and license with others, which often arouses undermining feelings of anger, jealousy and rejection. If any matchup can achieve an open marriage allowing true freedom of action, this would theoretically seem to be the one, but in practice it doesn't seem to work this way. Perhaps this indicates a lack of real trust.

In friendships in which responsibilities can be kept light, Taurus III's and Aquarius III's will enjoy seeing each other from time to time. Should they want to intensify their contact, however, they may only be asking for trouble. Acquaintanceships, colleague pairings and other contacts of a more casual nature usually work out better here, with the relationship's competitiveness egging its two partners on to greater and greater levels of accomplishment. Family matchups can work quite well, especially between siblings in childhood. These two will keep each other occupied for hours, playing creatively and having fun. When conflicts arise, wise parents will let them work things out between themselves, rather than coming down hard in blame or judgment.

ADVICE: The key to success is acceptance. Try to be less irritable. Overlook small matters. Seek positive goals. Avoid blame. Keep it light.

AQUARIUS-PISCES CUSP

Alleviating Insecurity

This relationship may well be built around social image and career. Both Taurus III's and Aquarius-Pisces carry a great deal of insecurity, which they often seek to alleviate through professional success and upward mobility. Childhood voices telling them they are inadequate or no good can only be stilled by a thundering ovation from the world, applauding their ambitious exploits. The relationship can also serve as an anodyne to distress or pain caused by Aquarius-Pisces negativity and Taurus III worry. It can prove therapeutic in helping both partners work out their insecurities in other ways than through ambition.

Aquarius-Pisces can learn social skills through understanding and stimulating friendships with Taurus III's, who are gifted in this area and will be gratified by being able to pass on these talents to their friends. The relationship itself may prove a sympathetic haven in times of need and distress. Through dealing constructively with the problems of others, as unofficial advisors or counselors, Taurus III's and Aquarius-Pisces can raise their own levels of confidence and self-esteem.

Love affairs may feature deeply empathic feelings. Both parties know what it is to be hurt, often having been so in childhood, and they can exhibit great sympathy to each other in sensitive psychological areas. Aquarius-Pisces may find themselves vaguely irritated by the optimistic attitudes of Taurus III's, who for their part can be annoyed by Aquarius-Pisces pessimism, but such polarities will soften over time as a middle ground is established. Indeed, learning to listen and compromise are important in this relationship, which has the potential for new levels of trust, fostering love, affection and ultimately passion. Marriages and working relationships here do not usually provide the stability such arrangements need. Family relationships are also tricky, since both these personalities, as children, are acutely sensitive to disapproval. Although a Taurus III or Aquarius-Pisces parent can be more understanding than most, inner pressures may force them to act out parental roles they knew in their own childhoods, and they may make the same mistakes.

ADVICE: Don't follow old scripts. Break the disapproval cycle. Develop trust and understanding. Ambition only takes you so far. Seek underlying causes.

THE WEEK OF SPIRIT
PISCES I

A Test of Maturity

The temptation for these partners is to engage in extremely subtle competition, each trying to outshine the other. The focus of a more enlightened Taurus III–Pisces I matchup will be overcoming such ego drives, first by becoming aware of them and then by working together to reinforce rather than divide the relationship. This may not be easy, however. Although these two are typically fairly understanding of each other, their relationship encourages neither empathy nor sympathy between them. They will have to do real work in order to learn to give each other the spotlight—but therein, of course, lies the opportunity for growth.

In love affairs in this combination, Taurus III's can be selfish without even being aware of it. Pisces I's tend to be more giving, even self-sacrificial, and must be careful not to be taken advantage of. Furthermore, they sometimes only give conditionally, holding on to resentment that they can unleash with fury on a Taurus III who has gone too far. Not only sharing but also unconditional giving (which expects no return) should be put into practice here.

Marriages can go along well enough during good times, but claiming attitudes will emerge after a falling-out. Children, house, car, cash, possessions—all or any of these may take over the spotlight. In many ways such items are only projections of the egotism of the relationship itself. Asking for equal treatment, but also refusing to indulge in destructive acts or speech, will be a true test of the relationship's maturity.

As friends these two can be free of material claims, but may be unbalanced by following an exclusive spiritual or philosophical path. They can be impressive and forward-looking in ideology, but may ignore the necessary responsibilities of everyday life.

Work situations can be therapeutic for these partners, forcing them to put group endeavors before their own needs. Here, all attempts to steal the spotlight may be counterproductive to the job at hand. Attention-seeking ploys will usually be dealt with sternly by bosses and even more so by angry co-workers.

ADVICE: Try not to demand so much attention. Work for the good of the group. Demonstrate maturity by sharing. Attend to daily jobs that need doing.

Flaunt It!

Concerned with trends and styles, this relationship also has the potential to determine them. Whether as co-workers in an industry such as fashion or design or simply as a pair with an interesting approach to taste that is emulated by their friends, this duo can have a real impact on their environment. Never falling victim to the prevailing wisdom, they will always determine their own approach. As a unit they are very much in the public eye. If times or customs should go against them, they have the resilience and usually a close circle of intimates to help them weather the storm until their brilliant style is once again recognized—and until then they will flaunt it anyway. The relationship brings out the extroverted side of Pisces II's. The chemistry here makes for a pair who enjoy entertaining as well as entertainment, and in general being at the center of their circle. They are likely to be quite theatrical at times, dressing up both at home and abroad.

Love affairs here tend to the flamboyant. Pisces II's have a rich fantasy life that this relationship puts to work, and Taurus III's also generate excitement with particularly outlandish behavior. Little embarrassment is felt here. The relationship may arouse antagonism, even violence, in others who take such behavior as a personal affront.

Friendships have their own kind of intimacy. In the partners' wide-ranging discussions with other friends, the most outlandish views can be aired without fear of reprisal. Extroverted thoughts will find a counterweight in more moderate and peaceful settings. Marriages are usually less successful: somehow the kiss of respectability does not sit with the relationship's outrageous, even antisocial stance. A settled marriage is likely to be happy enough, but may slowly extinguish the fire that came when these two were lovers.

Working relationships here are not at all recommended unless they deal with fashion, design or a borderline or covert activity with romantic overtones. Family relationships are similarly unfavorable—these two may make each other nervous, and will fail to understand or sympathize with each other's often diametrically opposed views.

ADVICE: Don't be too aggressive. Enjoy yourself, but don't always expect others to watch. Develop intimacy. Temper your views occasionally.

Guaranteed Survival

As far as possible, this relationship looks forward. Often at the forefront of their social circle, family or student group, these two will want to go fearlessly where no one has gone before. They focus little on either past hurts or past achievements, but view yesterday as gone and tomorrow as all-important. This positive viewpoint can help them go far, but remembering today is not a bad idea for them. They may be the first of their friends to rent a vacation house, arrange a trip to an exotic island, or put themselves in debt for a spiffy renovation, but meanwhile they're missing appointments or forgetting to pay bills.

Taurus III–Pisces III spouses can be quite successful if they also work together. And whether they are in business together or not, supportive and advisory attitudes are prominent in their relationship. Taurus III's will listen to Pisces III advice because it is generally taken from life experience, and Pisces III's will admire the way Taurus III's interact easily with others and win their trust. Children may be a special joy for this couple if they can take time away from their many activities to look after them properly.

Love affairs here are often covert in nature. At least one of the partners is often already in an established relationship, making secrecy imperative. So good are these two at hiding their activities that others may not find out about them until years later, if at all.

The pioneering spirit is strong in Taurus III–Pisces III friendships; travel and adventure, especially at a danger level that would set other people's teeth on edge, are viewed as quite ordinary here. But the partners are quite prudent about observing the necessary safety rules, thus guaranteeing their survival for another exploit.

Taurus III–Pisces III sibling relationships can be very tight, particularly opposite-sex ones. Despite forthright vocal confrontations, brother-sister ties are often the closest in the family, and can stabilize the entire group. Such connections may continue into adult life, growing warmer and more understanding as the years go by.

ADVICE: You may be endangering others. Try to be open and honest. Pay attention to those who need it. Don't take unnecessary risks. Be more reflective.

THE CUSP OF ENERGY
TAURUS-GEMINI CUSP

Short Circuits

No lack of energy here! The question is, will lines of communication become frazzled? Will the relationship burn itself out? Whether energies are flowing in the right direction or not, short circuits may demand that these two take periodic breaks from each other while fuses are replaced. Luckily, blowouts due to power surges, which occur even in the most successful of this combination's scenarios, benefit from the relationship's built-in circuit breakers, safety valves that automatically spring into action when the juice gets too hot to handle. Such devices are, however, built up over many years, through experience, patience, trust and understanding.

Taurus-Gemini have difficulty remaining in each other's presence for too long. They may take a look, out of curiosity, and then leave in short order. Relationships involving firm commitment, like those in the marital and work spheres, are likely to work out better than friendships and love relationships, which tend to be ephemeral—simply because they can be. A love affair or friendship between Taurus-Gemini can be sweet but fleeting. A memory or two is about all that the partners can hope to carry away with them. Hurtful or resentful attitudes will rarely have time to develop.

When marriages between Taurus-Gemini are successful, they can be combined easily and well with working relationships. Here energies coalesce in a total involvement that keeps partners busy twenty-four hours a day tending to domestic and career matters. Curiously, this is a commitment not so much to each other as to common activities. Taurus-Gemini too often resemble people less than forces that get things done. This unusual couple, then, will have to make an effort to clear free time to explore personal realms together.

Should two Taurus-Gemini children be siblings, the family should prepare for the worst. Rarely will others be ready to handle this level of noise (both verbal and physical) and need for attention. Parent-child relationships between two Taurus-Gemini are likely to be filled with miscommunication, which, like static, will tend to annoy others.

ADVICE: Try to limit your contacts. Understanding may take a long time. Don't give up. Structure your relationship around common activities.

THE CUSP OF ENERGY
TAURUS-GEMINI CUSP

Open Rivalry

This is not an easy relationship. Although these two share Gemini characteristics (mental agility, verbal ability, charm), what arise most often between them are challenge and combat. This is most often due to a rivalry for the attention or love of a third party, but can also be part of a battle of wits and wills to see who can win out. Competitiveness, and also a restlessly rebellious stance, are often at the heart of this relationship.

While it is possible for Taurus-Gemini and Gemini I's to get close, their relationship is more often apt to be based around a common activity or interest rather than on sharing emotions or trying to understand each other. If the common interest happens to be a person, however, disaster is probably looming. Envy, jealousy, even hatred can surface here, and the warfare can last for months or even years. Since these two are very equally matched, the relationship may resemble a battlefield littered with the dead and dying. Regrouping and fighting new battles can be the routine here, or, equally well, circumspectly avoiding direct confrontation, preferring to fight by other means. Colleagues and acquaintances often get along far better than closer friends. Being co-workers on a daily basis, or for that matter business partners, is not at all recommended.

Love relationships and marriages may be problematic: outright cheating, dishonesty and betrayal are likely to bring either of these relationships to a merciful conclusion. Marriages are the more tragic of the two, usually because of the time, money and expectations invested, or perhaps because of the presence of children.

Family relations—between cousins, or between aunts or uncles and nieces or nephews—tend to work better. Aunts and uncles of either personality type may become parent substitutes for the other, with inspiration, admiration and affection playing important roles. Cousins, too, may easily become closer than siblings, often strengthening or renewing ties between more emotionally distant family members.

ADVICE: Beware of combativeness. Learn to be more diplomatic but honest. Put jealousies to rest. Open lines of communication. Confront more gently.

Unacknowledged Fantasies

This relationship works in certain areas as long as both partners are free to pursue their own course. Projection often features here, with Gemini II's projecting their dark side on Taurus-Geminis and Taurus-Geminis projecting their deficiencies on Gemini II's, both at an unconscious level. Gemini II's will value communication with these particular partners, valuing their opinions highly and thriving on their attention. Taurus-Geminis, on the other hand, may just tolerate Gemini II garrulousness, or even criticize it, without realizing that they are equally talkative and are themselves open to rebuke.

In love affairs, Gemini II's are especially prone to the mechanism of projection, and Taurus-Geminis, ordinarily wilder and more unconventional than Gemini II's, may suddenly find themselves the object of this partner's uncontrollable passions. Such desires may smolder for years, often under the guise of friendship or harbored within a professional relationship, before suddenly bursting into flame. Frequently unrecognized or unacknowledged hidden dreams and sexual fantasies, in which Taurus-Geminis play the main role, are not uncommon with Gemini II's.

Marriage is not recommended between this pair, as they would be prone to fighting—if not sooner, then later. Critical and verbal abuse may follow bouts of lovemaking, and moods of all sorts wreak havoc on the relationship. Friendships are a better bet, but have a tendency either to dissolve or to evolve to another level. In many ways, teacher-student and boss-employee relationships are the best bet for these partners, but they work best when the Taurus-Gemini plays the dominant role.

Siblings of this combination are often good friends, particularly when of the opposite sex. Such brother-sister pairs exhibit empathy and understanding, while at the same time allowing tremendous freedom of action, thought and choice. Later in life, each of these two may seek out a relationship that mirrors this close family tie in childhood.

ADVICE: Try to stay objective. Investigate yourself at a deeper level. Remember who you are. Don't give up your identity so easily.

THE WEEK OF THE SEEKER
GEMINI III

Psychic Gifts

Unsatisfied with the mundane here and now, this relationship seeks to go beyond it and to achieve an original, even unique orientation. While both parties will insist on their independence, they may also find each other mutually fascinating, and so will feel the need to see each other more than occasionally. Such meetings are often highly private ones, in which what transpires is rarely public or even retold, except in the form of tantalizing gossip. The relationship's focus is fire, denoting intuition or warmth, creativity and joy.

Love affairs in particular may be covert. Far more than casual but also not necessarily deep, these relationships often express warmth, sympathy and admiration rather than searing emotion. Between Taurus-Geminis and Gemini III's, love and friendship may be very closely related. Psychic gifts and paranormal or synchronistic happenings may abound in this relationship; its strong mental orientation is often yoked to intuition.

Marriages between these two may not be really necessary, since it may have already taken place, in a sense, at least symbolically, in the couple's preceding friendship and love affair. As far as working together goes, despite the strong ties of understanding here, it is probably best if both partners pursue their own course, but touch base from time to time for consultations and evaluations of each other's work.

In the family, sibling relationships, especially between members of the opposite sex, may be strongly seductive. In both individuals, ego drives may be less strong than an overwhelming desire to please, and the two may become quite dependent on each other. Parent-child relationships may also exhibit covert or openly incestuous attitudes. Although loving, these bonds must eventually be broken or worked out in more mature relationships. If they are not, these childhood attitudes are likely to prove destructive in later life.

ADVICE: Develop individuality. Avoid dependencies. Break immature bonds. Preserve your vision and originality. Develop paranormal abilities.

THE CUSP OF ENERGY
TAURUS-GEMINI CUSP

Giving Counsel

This relationship focuses on communication, but not necessarily of a verbal kind. Its dominant mode can often be silence, and if the silence must be broken, this often happens in the most pleasing way possible, perhaps with music or a few murmured words. Written communication can often carry special meaning here, with perhaps an interest in books, manuscripts and their translations into different languages. Taurus-Geminis are a mixture of earth and air (Taurus is an earth sign, Gemini air) and Gemini-Cancers of air and water (Cancer is a water sign), so that the element they have in common is air, symbolizing thought.

One might expect love affairs to be of the more thoughtful variety, but the relationship's physical aspects, particularly those of touch, are also pronounced. Here the emphasis on silence and touch can lend romance, and the couple will need intimate and quiet spaces in which to meet. Intelligence and passion are in no way mutually exclusive here, and indeed work beautifully together. Covert love affairs between partners already involved with others may be particularly exciting, but may demand dishonest and ultimately hurtful behavior.

Marriages can work here, but, interestingly, may never materialize, due to circumstances or accidents of fate. Friendships may be possible, but seldom after the disappointing breakup of a love affair. Should these two meet first as friends, on the other hand, their relationship may either proceed farther, toward a love affair, or gradually dissolve away.

Professional and career relationships between these two, including student and teacher matchups, can be quite favorable. Not necessarily working together but advising and counseling each other, reviewing each other's work, and brainstorming new ideas are especially favored here. Gemini-Cancers are likely to admire the prodigious mental energies and eclectic knowledge of Taurus-Geminis, who for their part may learn a great deal from Gemini-Cancers' easy mastery of their field. Family relationships are favored in parent-child combinations. Parental Gemini-Cancer nurturing qualities are especially reassuring to unstable or nervous Gemini-Cancer offspring.

ADVICE: Be careful of romantic involvement. Try to be open and honest. Don't be carried away by fantasy. Share ideas. Give counsel on a regular basis.

Tempering Enthusiasm

June 25–July 2

THE WEEK OF THE EMPATH
CANCER I

This relationship may focus on the worlds of both ideas and feelings, and in either area, its tendency is to push the boundaries back to their furthest limit. Big ideas and grand passions will be explored, either through discussion or actual experience. It is also possible for intellectual discussions to get carried away by the heat of argument and for feelings and experiences to be examined logically, thus blending areas of thought and emotion.

Expansive love affairs may carry desire to new heights, but frustrations arise through an inability to satisfy overblown expectations. Taurus-Geminis' frequent lack of self-understanding and the Cancer I tendency toward depression can prove a debilitating combination. In marriage, both parties need to be realistic, which means knowing when to scale back and when to encourage patterns of spending—whether of emotions, finances or life energy. Too often an imbalance here can lead to financial problems in which the relationship has few reserves to fall back on and little to give.

Friendships are likely to be difficult here between contemporaries, yet between old and young they may thrive, having a certain distance, perspective and objectivity that eliminate the anger or irritation felt with members of the same age group. Mutual respect is usually the antidote to such conflict. Work and family relationships are likely to bring out both partners' worst and best sides. Moderation is the key here, for emotions and unrealistic fantasy can quickly get out of control. Parent-child relationships are likely to demonstrate patterns of overvaluing or undervaluing, leading to feelings alternately of superiority or inferiority, conceit and self-esteem.

In all of the above relationships, it will be clear that temperance and balance are needed, but certainly not repression of enthusiastic attitudes. Sometimes a neutral third party or therapist may help move the awareness process along.

ADVICE: Even out your moods. Beware of too high expectations. Take things as they come. Keep anger under control. Little is possible without respect.

THE WEEK OF THE UNCONVENTIONAL
CANCER II

Excessive Interest

This can be an adventuresome and challenging matchup, given to searching for ever stranger and more out-of-the-way areas of experience. Assuming the partners agree on the areas they want to explore, they can share a great interest and involvement in subjects ranging from helping the disadvantaged to researching historical curiosities. Reading classified ads and visiting antique or junk stores, garage sales and auctions are all part of the picture. United by an interest in peculiar personal traits, the relationship may well find its own members the most interesting objects of study.

In love relationships and friendships, for example, these two can be excessively interested in each other's bodies and health. Anything abnormal or unusual is likely to fascinate. Taurus-Geminis have a propensity to check their immediate environment on a regular basis, and Cancer II's to become unduly attached to certain thoughts or fantasies; with tendencies like these, their relationship can easily become obsessive-compulsive, with Taurus-Geminis providing the compulsions and Cancer II's the obsessions. The result may be a total preoccupation with physical processes, thoughts, responses and the most minute or seemingly insignificant actions. Such a relationship may not be completely healthy psychologically, but can prove absorbing and pleasurable.

Marriages in this combination are likely to be disturbed by obsessive-compulsive anxieties, worries and repetitive actions. Fear of almost anything, or almost everything, can drive these two, their children and everyone around them to distraction. Marriage is only recommended for them, then, as a means of facing and ultimately overcoming such fears. If this can be done, the couple can move from a therapeutic to a productive relationship.

Family relationships, especially parent-child matchups, can easily fall into neurotic patterns. Anxiety and guilt engendered in a Taurus-Gemini child by a Cancer II parent, or vice versa, can last a lifetime. Working relationships are probably this combination's most positive manifestations, particularly when the search to fulfill shared goals can be managed with a minimum of personal contact.

ADVICE: Don't get hung up on details. Get rid of fears. Remember to forget occasionally. Checking everything constantly is a waste of energy.

Against All Odds

This powerful relationship often takes on big projects, and the intuitiveness of its assumptions, and of the way it implements them, may allow it to overcome and succeed against all odds. So intuitive is it, in fact, that it may find itself producing prophetic and predictive ideas about whether its endeavors will pan out and how rewarding they will be. Great care must be taken with prophecies, however, for fate has a strange way of making them true, but not always in the manner expected. A dark side manifests strongly in many areas of this relationship, raising the possibility of illicit, destructive and excessive forms of behavior.

Love affairs and marriages are likely to be tumultuous and unstable. Should Cancer III desires get out of hand, they may have to be capped, like a burning oil well. These personalities' wisdom, self-control and self-knowledge are usually great enough to prevent this from happening, but may lead to a different problem, resulting in a self-protectiveness that will prove a sexual challenge to more aggressive Taurus-Geminis, who long to break through such barriers. Although rebellious, Taurus-Geminis often back off in fear, and wind up depending instead on Cancer III protective, caring and nurturing qualities.

Friendships can work out well if the relationship's energies serve interests rather than end up wasted. The matchup's spiritual, paranormal and predictive tendencies favor activities ranging from self-actualization workshops to gambling at roulette or cards. In family settings this can be a strong relationship, especially when it offers Taurus-Gemini-Cancer III siblings protection against an unkind or abusive parent. In the case of absentee parents, brothers and sisters in this combination may play parental roles for other siblings and for each other.

Work pairings can be quite successful. Money-making is especially favored, but a spiritual approach may be of greater interest; these areas rarely coalesce, but when they do, the results can go beyond all expectations. Although this duo prides itself on being realistic, the partners will often be surprised, both pleasantly and unpleasantly, by events that contradict glib predictions.

ADVICE: Know yourself better. Beware of excess. Repression will produce frustration. Find creative and spiritual outlets.

A Holistic Picture

Complete and well-balanced, this relationship also works magic. Taurus-Gemini is ruled by earth and air, Cancer-Leo by water and fire, a combination that in this case betokens a beautiful balance of all four elements. This holistic picture is appreciated by Taurus-Geminis and Cancer-Leos, two types who separately tend toward instability but together can bring it all together. The relationship itself is governed by two elements, air (thought) and water (feelings), which here means that logical planning in areas appealing to the emotions will often achieve success. Complementarity is the key to this relationship; these partners are able to fill in each other's gaps, making a synergistic whole far greater than the sum of its parts.

In love relationships, Taurus-Gemini talents and ideas can hold the interest of Cancer-Leos—an essential ability for them. Taurus-Geminis meanwhile can find adventure and excitement with this partner. Instability, at times through infidelity either real or imagined, will always be an issue here, but the duo's belief in itself, and in undying desire, will sustain it through rough times. The relationship's essential balance is usually restored after each tilt.

In work, family and marital relationships, the wedding of logic and emotion produces a kind of emotional intelligence that will carry these partners a long way. Rarely will irrationality tempt these partners to jeopardize their unity or work against their own interests. The magical element here gives them charisma, so that any products they are engaged in producing, and any children they have, will be irresistible or at least charming.

Friendships are more than possible—in fact the good feelings they are likely to include, and the desire to spend more time together, will often make them develop into work partnerships, marriages or love affairs. If so, however, the partners must be prepared to give up some of their freedom, and may later regret having gone farther. Sometimes the best answer for these friends is to stay that way, or even to back off and meet only on special occasions.

ADVICE: Retain individuality. Groups are effective but only take you so far. Don't be overconfident. A good thing should not be taken for granted.

Acute Differences of Temperament

The tone of this relationship is serious, perhaps a bit too serious for Taurus-Geminis, whose rebelliousness will be brought out by overbearing Leo I's, and whom these powerful partners may also reject as flaky or dilettantish. The standard of responsibility stressed here is often such that neither person feels able to live up to it. Yet scaling back and lowering expectations are not easily accomplished. There is also a need for a strong ruling force, which often, however, has to be outside the relationship—it cannot usually be embodied by either partner. Similarly, it can be a set of laws, but one that both partners can accept will be hard to formulate.

Problems of this type abound in marital, work and family relationships. For most Leo I's, uncertainty is unbearable, and they may be anything but reassured by their interactions with Taurus-Geminis, who are mercurial in the extreme and whose changing moods, desires and needs are likely to drive Leo I's up the wall. Should Leo I's try to yell or put their foot down, Taurus-Geminis are usually gone. Both of these partners do better as freelancers at work, as free agents in a marriage, and as independent family members, but unfortunately this kind of independence may weaken or dissolve the bonds that hold such relationships together. If Taurus-Gemini-Leo I marriages, work projects and parent-child relationships are to succeed, compromises will have to be worked out and firm agreements reached about responsibilities and rules. Until this is done, chaos may reign. Friendships here are much more desirable and easy. Same-sex matchups are especially favored, and can be among the more successful relationships between Geminis and Leos of any kind. Trust and honesty must be felt instinctively rather than imposed from without. This pair can discharge its weekly or monthly responsibilities easily as long as they are not too great, and in times of need the relationship will exhibit an open door and an open pocketbook. Taurus-Gemini-Leo I love affairs are infrequent and not recommended, chiefly because of acute differences of temperament.

ADVICE: Compromise is necessary. Give up some of your independence. Pitch in and contribute. Rules are necessary, but don't forget to have fun.

Who's Feeling What?

These two are on the same wavelength. Understanding and sympathy are immediate and evident in this relationship, and feelings are empathic. The partners can identify with each other to a great degree, feeling each other's pain or joy. An interesting mechanism at work here, one often observed in empaths, is that if the Leo II feels an emotion, such as anger, but does not express it, the Taurus-Gemini may get angry without knowing why—actually taking on the other's affect, like a chameleon. So real are the emotions that partners often mistake the other person's feelings for their own.

Love and marriage may both be tempestuous—not surprising, given the level of feeling involved. Taurus-Gemini is ruled by air and earth, Leo II by fire, but the combination is governed by water, denoting emotion. This relationship tends to be passionate to the point of incandescence. Instability, anger, jealousy, violence—any or all of these may appear here. Although empathy manifests, too, swirling emotions and ego defenses often prevent it from manifesting in its pure form. It emerges more evidently and consistently in sibling matchups and friendships, siblings in particular being very close, almost like twins, or perhaps like Alexandre Dumas's Corsican brothers, who were able to sense each other's feelings miles apart. Friendships are also likely to be open and sharing.

Professional relationships between these two can be very successful. Both Taurus-Gemini and Leo II's are endowed with prodigious energy, and if they can make their energies work in tandem and in the right direction, much can be accomplished. Taurus-Gemini will supply the initial burst needed to get projects off the ground, while Leo II's will steadfastly and energetically push them to completion. When the pair are co-workers, competitive and personal feelings may get in the way, but boss-employee situations can work extremely well: despite rebellious tendencies in both these partners, each can accept the other as a boss when a hierarchical structure requires it, as long as they respect and even admire each other.

ADVICE: Try to separate feelings. Take responsibility only for what is yours. Don't let your emotions get out of control. Encourage openness.

LEO III

Emotional Intelligence

Acknowledging personal emotions is the underlying theme of this relationship. The Taurus-Gemini and the Leo III must try to understand and accept not only their own and each other's feelings but those of people outside the relationship, and they must apply that understanding in social situations. This is the pairing's great challenge. The relationship can be successful only if each partner's feelings are mastered; emotional repression can only lead to frustration, anxiety and depression. Feelings must be dealt with maturely, and with patience, trust and understanding. These qualities don't come easy to either Taurus-Gemini or Leo III's, but they can be attained with work. The fact that this is not an unrealistic goal speaks well for this combination.

As individuals, Taurus-Gemini and Leo III's share three problems: a lack of deep self-understanding, a low threshold of patience, and a capacity for considerable self-involvement. Love and marriage between these two may worsen such tendencies to the point where it becomes doubtful that the relationship will last long enough to implement some of the emotional management it needs. Should a deep love emerge, however, it can be accompanied by a willingness to endure the necessary travail.

Family relationships in this combination, especially parent-child, need a lot of emotional intelligence. Taurus-Gemini are often anxious to please, and exhibit unformed egos; Leo III's have big egos and can ride roughshod over others. As parents, then, Leo III's are likely to crush or spoil their Taurus-Gemini children, while the Taurus-Gemini parent may be dominated by the powerful Leo III child.

At work, the relationship will demand understanding. If emotions aren't kept in check, the job will not get done. Deep emotional involvement is not favored, but as long as this is kept in mind, Taurus-Gemini and Leo III's who work together may do all right, particularly if they are colleagues or associates rather than bosses and employees. This relationship will allow them to build respect slowly, through cooperation, and to work out a healthy emotional balance.

ADVICE: Keep trying. The result is worth the effort. Beware of selfishness and impatience. Get to know yourself better. Work out emotional problems.

The Hand of Fate

This combination may be unusual in many respects—how the partners meet, the speed with which their relationship develops, and the experiential byways that they explore together are seldom of the ordinary sort. The relationship's focus, too, is likely to be unconventional, and in a way not at all put on for the benefit of the other partner or for friends or family, but intrinsically so. Fate often plays a large role in bringing these two together, but when they meet it is as if they have known each other before, as if (or actually?) in another life. Thus the relationship is often permeated by a feeling of déjà vu, but in a good way—a way that heightens the excitement of its experiences by promoting a foreknowledge of whatever is going on.

Love affairs in this combination are apt to be highly expressive. Both partners often have the feeling that what's happening is right, or is meant to be, even when the relationship is covert or socially unacceptable in conventional terms. The affair draws these two like a magnet, and although it may be short and intense in length, after it is over the lovers may become friends. It may also be ended by the couple's marriage, but this step may prove unnecessary or premature, and should be considered carefully.

Friendships are likely to be enduring, whether the partners have been lovers or not. Quirky, even bizarre elements can emerge here. Each partner feels an admiration and sympathy for the intelligence and artistic sensitivity of the other, and an interest in the work the other does; thus friendships may evolve into working relationships, or vice versa. In whatever area, the matchup speaks of mutability, adaptability, and responsiveness to each other's needs. But problems arising from Leo-Virgo secretiveness and Taurus-Gemini megalomania can be severe, and may ultimately lead to a sudden breakup. In families, this unusual relationship is less likely to be successful between parents and children than between grandparents and grandchildren, uncles or aunts and nieces or nephews, or between cousins. Not only understanding but financial support is often forthcoming here, enabling the younger person to develop his or her skills.

ADVICE: Don't surrender your free will. Not everything is written. What are you trying to prove? Find out your true wishes and desires. Think clearly.

Success at Any Cost

This couple will let nothing stand in their way—they are determined to succeed at any cost. Determination is the keyword here. Also emphasized is intelligence (evidenced by Mercury's rulership of both Gemini and Virgo), generally of a more practical than pedantic kind. In fact the practical ability here far exceeds that of these individuals by themselves. Planning is a prominent activity, and the relationship's shared visions and dreams are generally of a worldly, goal-oriented nature. By paying attention to detail and taking one step at a time, these two can ultimately achieve whatever aim they choose.

Love affairs are seldom successful here, even if the partners share a physical attraction. The Taurus-Gemini charm for other people makes Virgo I's insecure, and they are likely to withdraw, disappointed and hurt. Taurus-Geminis may feel guilty for inflicting pain, but this won't usually keep them from involvements elsewhere. Lacking a strong focus, the relationship is likely to drift and fall apart.

Business and marriage partnerships, and shared participation as volunteers in social activities, are more recommended. Especially favored are endeavors in which there is a great deal to lose and perhaps even more to gain, thus forcing the pair to be aspiring and watchful. The stress here can become enormous—perhaps too much for nervous Taurus-Geminis and Virgo I's to handle. It is usually self-induced, however, so readjusting conditions and work habits intelligently may alleviate (but rarely solve) the problem. Taurus-Gemini-Virgo I friendships are often built around a serious endeavor, whether mental or physical. Leisure-time interests as different as chess and football, or cards and fitness, illustrate the relationship's extremes. Taurus-Geminis will benefit from the structure that is usual here, while Virgo I's will refuel from Taurus-Geminis' abundant energy.

Brother-sister pairs in this combination may be symbiotically close, both while growing up and in adulthood. Their mental connection is strong not only in terms of reason and common sense but also, possibly, in the psychic sphere. Even so, the pair may consciously reject the idea that anything paranormal is at work.

ADVICE: Don't get bottled up in your head. Learn to relax. Worry is poison. Turn off the big brain. Remember to forget. Avoid hurtful behavior.

THE WEEK OF THE ENIGMA
VIRGO II

Point Counterpoint

This relationship is geared toward debate, argument and the detective work that results in a theory or answer for a question. Both partners will find themselves trying to convince the other of their viewpoint—and will surprise themselves by finding this so important. Each will be particularly concerned with trying to illuminate the meaning behind the other's actions. In conversation, for example, Taurus-Gemini, never known for tact, will analyze a Virgo II's enigmatic foibles, trying to make this partner understand what his or her own character is really about. But this is a tear-out-your-hair exercise, since Virgo II's rarely reveal all, and would never admit it if they did. Furthermore, they have often suffered in childhood from criticism by others, are thin-skinned, and may retaliate with their own refined critiques. Thus an open discussion can escalate into a battle of wills and words.

Love here is rarely out in the open. Falling short of a full-blown affair, it may encompass many stages of flirtation, courting and unnoticed come-ons, all piquing curiosity but only leading to frustration. Nor are marriages recommended: with Taurus-Gemini making demands and Virgo II refusing them, these partners will drive each other crazy. A folie à deux, fixed on a shared delusion, is only one of the nightmares perhaps awaiting this relationship.

Friendships, however, may work out well: although the partners' outside interests may eclipse their interest in each other, this only means that investigations of science, mathematics, aesthetics, philosophy and psychology may give their relationship a basis. A specialized interest in illicit activities, whether in mystery stories or in real life, may prove especially stimulating. Working and family relationships are only likely to be upset by the pair's almost obsessive activity. This team is not recommended for getting the job done: in the middle of a task, they are likely to be attracted by an interesting detail, causing an immediate detour and even the derailment of a project that only moments before was going nicely. Parent-child and boss-employee matchups in particular are liable to experience friction, worry and bother.

ADVICE: Learn to back off. Voyeurism isn't always appreciated. Respect others' privacy. Try to keep on track. Living in interesting times can be a curse.

Backbone of the Family

Excitement and imagination figure prominently in this bright and lively relationship, which is apt to focus on dramatic happenings in which change is the common denominator. Changes of residence, of mood, of financial status, of career—any and all of these, and more, may feature in the relationship's life. This mutability has a shadow side, in that its insecurity can lead to dominating or controlling tendencies. Virgo III's in particular, who like things to be clearly defined, will try to take matters in hand if they feel out of control.

Love affairs are likely to bring out the tempestuous side of both partners, and a tendency toward vociferous quarrels. Behind these arguments, however, lies a respect that endures no matter how strident the accusations. Blame and guilt trips are likely to emerge, but also ecstatic moments and long periods of good feeling. The mood here is unpredictable, a bit like the weather.

Marriages are not particularly recommended: they may feature a level of conflict and a lack of stability from which children can hardly benefit. Changing moods and attempts at control will not be conducive to either domestic tranquillity or mental health. Family relationships, on the other hand, especially with a parent and child of the opposite sex, and working matchups (co-workers, boss-employee, or professional colleagues) can be productive and understanding. Parent-child relationships can prove the backbone of the family, signaling an interesting combination of responsibility and changeableness. This duo can run a tight ship, using hope and good humor to roll with the storms of fate. Both at work and at home, the relationship eschews snobbishness, promotes fairness and equality and is on the side of the underdog. It usually views highly ambitious, pretentious or rich individuals with some suspicion.

Friendships between these two can be pleasant enough, but emotionally they rarely develop far. Gemini-Cancers and Virgo III's are usually too busy with their work, love and family relationships to devote a great deal of time to friendship with each other. The relationship may be counted upon, however, in times of need.

ADVICE: Set aside quality time for relaxation. Reduce quarreling. Enjoy yourself. Don't get bogged down in work and responsibilities. Try to trust that all is well.

Girl with the Curl

This relationship experiences wide fluctuations. Although their trine aspect (120° apart) in the zodiac is considered to promote ease, and the two partners share an earth-air orientation (Taurus and Virgo are earth signs, Gemini and Libra are air), the relationship is about water and fire, a combination producing changes in state (water extinguishes fire, fire turns water to steam). Such physical changes indicate an underlying instability and often sudden and unpredictable mood swings. Here we have a perfect example of the irony of relationships: two perfectly well-suited individuals together create the exact opposite of what each is looking for—peace and quiet—but in doing so they create a crucible for learning and growing.

In love affairs, marriages and family relationships, things may seem to be going well when upset manifests for no apparent reason. This is a real problem for this pair, neither of whom is particularly good at looking deeper into things. Moreover, Taurus-Geminis lack self-awareness and Virgo-Libras want peace and harmony, a combination disturbing to both when problems arise—Taurus-Geminis will become even more nervous than usual here. The obvious need is for a greater consciousness within the relationship, one that attempts to understand and address underlying problems and to avoid glossing over them by giving things a positive spin.

Friendships are less subject to outbursts and mood swings, but may not go very deep. More casual relationships, such as acquaintanceships or companionships centered around a common activity, often establish a calmer rapport, and may have an intellectual, philosophic or artistic orientation.

Working relationships tend to place excessive demands on both members, who will try to meet them but may ultimately fail. Taurus-Geminis will often urge Virgo-Libras to be more expressive, while Virgo-Libras will urge Taurus-Geminis to produce more beautiful or technically perfect work. Like the girl with the curl, this duo too often provides a product or service that is uncertain in quality—sometimes very good and sometimes, well, not horrid, but quite a bit below par.

ADVICE: Try to even out your work. Aim for consistency. Promote self-understanding. Infections sometimes demand immediate attention.

Outwitting the Other

This relationship orients itself toward matters of the mind. Bringing perceptions to awareness, and drawing conclusions from them, are quick, sometimes almost immediate. An explosive streak threatens here, resembling summer storms, with their sudden intensity and heat lightning. Outbursts of this kind, however, may act as a warning, and rarely materialize in full-blown physical conflict. Because conclusions are arrived at so quickly, partners would do well to give themselves a cooling-off period before addressing issues, and then, having done so, to be sure to discuss everything. Should thoughts or feelings be suppressed here, anxiety, fear and jealousy may be sublimated into competitive drives. This relationship isn't always of the most trusting or stable sort. A polarity often emerges in which either the Taurus-Gemini or the Libra I becomes the teacher and their partner the student, either formally, in a school situation, or in relation to an activity, perhaps sport-related, musical or spiritual. The relationship can be based on a will to overcome, with attendant power struggles, friendly or not.

Love relationships may not last long in this combination, but their shortness may be merciful and they are fairly harmless. There is an undeniable sexual attraction, but both partners are wary of initiating action, preferring to joust with each other romantically until one of them senses an opening. It is not uncommon for these two to attach to each other when one or both of them is already in a troubled relationship.

In friendships, each partner's desire to outwit the other encourages feelings of competitiveness and envy. Familial and marital relations are more likely to be productive, as long as competition is positively oriented and attention to any third party can be kept under control. Physical contact is always tricky here, and will have to be treated with some sensitivity to avoid catastrophe. Mentally this pair may shine (especially siblings of the same sex), with the Taurus-Gemini providing the imagination and raw energy and the Libra I the technical expertise. Understandably, given the competitiveness here, working relationships between these two don't usually work out.

ADVICE: Competitiveness should be mutually rewarding. Deal with negative feelings. Don't fool yourself. Winning out may mean losing.

The Third Ear

This relationship often focuses on examining the written and spoken word. But although communication is important here, the matchup is actually more about intuitive knowing—listening with a third ear. These two are so much on the same wavelength that their mutual understanding is their most precious possession. They will enjoy their mental contact, gaining great satisfaction, for example, from discussions of business, aesthetic, spiritual and psychological matters. There is a need to keep things objective here, for these partners' intense emotions could easily sweep both of them away. But they do have the ability to retain their individual objectivity within this relationship, assuring its durability.

Still, love relationships can be somewhat dangerous here. This may make the attraction even stronger at times, for both partners can have an unrealistic streak in matters of the heart. But their intuitive wariness of each other with regard to sexual involvement usually betokens good sense, and makes them wait before becoming more deeply involved. Should this pair make a commitment, it will probably result in them getting married or living together. Taurus-Gemini–Libra II marriages can be solid but also soulful. Difficulties may arise due to Taurus-Gemini selfishness and Libra II low self-esteem, but love and understanding can often overcome these and other problems. Once their passions cool, these two will find that their relationship gives them a very positive outlook.

Friendships here may be close and warm, but, like love, will have to be kept under control. Family relationships may also have tempestuous tendencies. Meeting at appointed times, with a while between them, will aid the process of objectivity. Both partners must guard against losing themselves in the relationship.

Working relationships may succeed as long as argumentative tendencies are kept under control. Here the relationship's verbal and intuitive strengths find a constructive, possibly commercial outlet that can give direction to what might otherwise have become idle discussion, albeit an interesting one.

ADVICE: Structure the relationship. Keep feelings under control. Find a creative outlet, possibly a financial one. Give counsel without getting involved.

Forever Young

This relationship is best when free and easy, with few responsibilities assumed by either partner. It may well focus on social and universal issues, and on not just discussing them but getting out of the house and doing something about the state of the world. This is not a crusading or visionary matchup, however, exerting its influence mainly within its immediate social, occupational or family circle. Nonetheless, it stands up for what it believes is right. Justice and fairness are strong values here, and although this partnership will explore all legal loopholes, rarely if ever will it take unfair advantage of people.

Love between these two is unlikely to be primarily romantic. If a love affair ends, it may not be entirely abandoned; this can be a platonic couple, developing strongly protective and supportive feelings about each other as passions decline. Critical attitudes are not suspended, however, and disagreements are to be expected. The strongly developed egos of many Libra III's may force Taurus-Geminis into playing a subordinate role, something they may not be ready to do.

In marriages and friendships, Libra III's will usually bring Taurus-Geminis into a more meaningful relationship with society in general and the professional world in particular. In this respect they become their partner's teachers. In one-on-one and family involvements, on the other hand, it is Taurus-Geminis who have much to show Libra III's.

Some family relationships can be excellent here. Youthful attitudes are encouraged, and parent-child combinations may succeed in keeping both parties forever young. Libra III's don't always realize how much they need to be part of a successful family group. Taurus-Geminis may succeed both in making Libra III's aware of these needs and in helping to satisfy them, perhaps as a step-parent, step-child or more distant relative. Taurus-Gemini–Libra III work relationships do not usually pan out, since both parties may be too hardheaded to compromise or agree.

ADVICE: Keep it light. Be aware of deeper needs. Develop social and family contacts. It is never too late to start over. Clean up your act.

Mind Games

This combination's strength is its mind power. Both partners value mental functions, having a talent for reasoning and logic; yet their relationship generally focuses on intuition, or on active expression and will. What happens when these tendencies are combined? The appearance of a rather aggressive mental stance. Together these two may assume they are mentally superior to others, and may battle between themselves to prove who is smartest. The effects can be highly negative, featuring mind games and overintellectualizing. It is hard for the pair to avoid these battles of the brain completely, but if they can join forces and express themselves against the world, they can become leaders. Otherwise they will be pitted against each other.

In love affairs, Taurus-Gemini's intent on pleasing this particular partner are in for a rude shock: their impatient earthiness will not gel with Libra-Scorpio ambivalence of feeling. Libra-Scorpios are often split between what they think they need and want emotionally and what they really do need and want. In the face of this lack of self-knowledge, Taurus-Gemini's may go on a fruitless and frustrating wild-goose chase in trying to please them. Also, their own need to absorb punishment may dovetail with the Libra-Scorpio desire to dish it out, creating a nightmarish scenario. Marriage is not recommended here, but often occurs, banking on a kinship of thought that too often masks spiritual and emotional immaturity.

Friendships can be well balanced as long as emotional manipulation is kept out of the picture. The sharing of intellectual and artistic interests is a joy that may continue for a lifetime. This relationship may shine within a social circle that takes an affectionate pride in its achievements.

Work relationships may be productive, but power struggles and one-upmanship too often mar them unless a conscious effort is made at solidarity. In that case the pair's competitive stance can bring them far. Family relationships, particularly parent-child combinations, can be stormy, with the exception of brother-sister matchups, which come closest to friendships in achieving a sympathetic and dynamic balance.

ADVICE: Tune in to your deepest self. Develop intuitive powers. Don't get sidetracked by ideas and discussion. Grasp what is most important.

THE WEEK OF INTENSITY
SCORPIO I

Unpredictable Petulance

This progressive, forward-looking and unpredictable relationship can go in any direction. Erratic impulses dot the landscape when it is on; when it is off, there is a deadly silence. The relationship's principal problem and challenge is acceptance. These two often get irritated with each other; each of them knows how to push the other's buttons. For one partner to stop doing this may solve only half of the problem, since the other partner also needs to make his or her buttons harder to push.

Love and marriage are difficult here. Scorpio I's are control freaks; Taurus-Gemini's have to do things their own way, and despite their energy they are not tough enough to stand up to incessant Scorpio I demands. Interested in short-term gratification, Taurus-Gemini's will probably be gone if Scorpio I's try to pin them down. Sometimes, however, a weary Taurus-Gemini will crave the control of a Scorpio I, finding it comforting to be unburdened of responsibility. This will usually occur later in life, after the Taurus-Gemini has sown every possible oat. Scorpio I's, meanwhile, may be better able to enjoy Taurus-Gemini energy and imagination once they too are older and their judgmental nature has mellowed.

Friendships and family relationships may be close, but can be upset or worse by what either partner perceives as a thoughtless act. Scorpio I's will condemn impure motives and Taurus-Gemini's poor results, both laying on guilt and blame. The ability to forgive and accept (neither is likely to forget) will generally determine whether or not friends, parents and children, or siblings go on speaking to each other.

Working relationships may be both steadily productive and capable of epic feats. Scorpio I's are detail oriented and hate to be rushed, while Taurus-Gemini's are impatient and may take shortcuts. The Taurus-Gemini drive to finish a task and move on will be countered by the dogged determination of Scorpio I's to stick to the task, even perhaps working it to death. This dynamic can produce wonderful results, however, as long as the co-workers do not drive each other crazy.

ADVICE: Let go of the past. You are carrying heavy burdens. Lighten up. There may be an easier way to get work done. Control irritations. Accept.

THE WEEK OF DEPTH
SCORPIO II

Follow the Leader

This relationship is characterized not by a struggle for power but by a serious attempt to give it direction. This cannot always be accomplished by unanimity of opinion, which too often leads to well-meaning decisions that are never implemented; one partner has to take the lead. This decision-making power, however, may change hands from one situation to another, reversing the roles of leader and follower. When areas of expertise are clearly defined, the choice of leader is obvious, but conflicts may arise in day-to-day situations as to how roles are played out, and it is here that the relationship's intuitive focus either succeeds or fails.

Love relationships usually favor Taurus-Gemini taking the lead. They are often highly passionate, but Scorpio II depression may emerge in direct proportion to sexual intensity. For a Taurus-Gemini who needs to be appreciated and expects joy to be the result of such lovemaking, this can be paralyzing. If neither partner is willing or able to take the lead and adopt a realistic hard line, marriages too may founder, tending to drift, lose direction and finally wind up on the rocks. Nervous or depressed parents preoccupied with their own problems rarely have time for children—an especially tragic result.

The best of all relationships in this combination is friendship. Here Taurus-Gemini and Scorpio II's, particularly of the same sex, may form an extremely close and empathic bond, and the lead will change hands effortlessly with little or no conflict. Resentments and annoyances will certainly surface, but can usually be expressed and released.

Co-workers and family members may be able to strike an equal balance, in which each holds up his or her end of the bargain. Mutual respect and a desire to work for the company's or family's good can guarantee success, but feelings of warmth are usually slow to develop. Building trust is essential before any meaningful emotional exchange is possible.

ADVICE: Look on the bright side. Don't let yourself be dragged down. Give direction to your efforts. Take the lead whenever necessary.

THE WEEK OF CHARM
SCORPIO III

Rare Crystal

Both parties treat this relationship with great care, knowing that its sensitivity renders it precious and fragile, like rare crystal. First meetings here are often warm but wary. A long and uninterrupted period is needed for trust and acceptance to begin to grow, and wise partners know not to push or try to accelerate this process. Respect generally emerges, not just the type that implies general human value, or that recognizes an undue level of dedication. It is the kind of respect generated when you realize that someone is capable of hurting you but chooses not to—and, also, a respect for the unique nature of a relationship that can see its partners through good times and bad.

Magnetic attractions, especially romantic or sexual ones, are not uncommon here. Often, however, they are hidden in nature, even to the partners themselves, except for occasional hints and glimpses. One day these passions may be revealed with terrifying force. The problem is that the partners may already have built a satisfying relationship in the spheres of work or friendship, relationships that may be sitting on a keg of dynamite. At the point when strong physical feelings are first sensed, work partners and friends have an obligation to bring them to light in order to avoid catastrophe later. But platonic friendships can be highly rewarding, particularly if they involve the sharing of artistic or spiritual pursuits. Likewise, in the most successful professional relationships, associates or boss-employee pairs sublimate primary drives into work projects.

In marriages and families, both Taurus-Gemini and Scorpio III's will benefit from group support and social influences. Such groups tend to mitigate this pair's tendency to isolate themselves, and by forcing them to interact socially on a daily basis, to both strengthen the relationship and make it more flexible. Scorpio III jealousy and claiming behavior, however, as well as Taurus-Gemini fickleness and game-playing, will have to be monitored and dealt with carefully. Whether the pair are siblings or spouses, demands are high. Neither party is unaware of the stakes involved.

ADVICE: Keep feelings out in the open. Avoid ambiguities. Level with each other. Stay objective. Feelings are valuable but explosive. Give up claims.

A Conduit of Knowledge

Taurus-Gemini and Scorpio-Sagittarius lie opposite each other in the zodiac. Oppositions denote stress but also magnetic attraction, and in this case the latter is pronounced. The relationship's keynote is bringing hidden material to light, especially that of a spiritual, religious or ideological nature. Whether these secret concepts and ideas are revealed to a social circle or to the public at large, Taurus-Gemini-Scorpio-Sagittarius energies are powerful in transmitting them. The relationship is a conduit of knowledge.

Love and marriage between these two can work as long as they don't intrude on more important ground: both Taurus-Gemini and Scorpio-Sagittarius tend to put their work first. Romantic encounters must be carefully scheduled for special times and places. Problems will arise if domestic or relationship demands upset the rhythm of working. If unresolved Taurus-Gemini resentment, Scorpio-Sagittarius guilt or mutual emotional upsets are truly intrusive, they will often be dealt with ruthlessly, making it clear that personal feelings are of secondary importance to these two and must be eliminated if they prove a bother. In the long run, unfortunately, the refusal to deal with underlying personal problems will generally exacerbate tensions rather than alleviate them.

Friends or family members with this combination may succeed in working together—spouses and lovers will find it harder. Particularly between members of the same sex, it is possible and even necessary that close feelings of trust and affection prevail while the pair is working on a common project. Freelance or business partnerships, then, and the administration of social groups or organizations are especially favored here.

Given the priority of career over personal life, expectations of worldly success run high in the work sphere. Yet the true measure of the relationship's mettle will be its ability to survive failure and catastrophe and to come up fighting. Guts and determination often allow projects to take shape whether funding is present or not, so convinced are this pair of their worth. It will be a challenge for them to demand adequate recompense while the work is being done, rather than relying on confident expectations.

ADVICE: Don't take personal matters for granted. Beware of excessive ambition. Demand recognition and reward. Build on the past, invest in the future.

THE WEEK OF INDEPENDENCE
SAGITTARIUS I

Building Bridges

The challenge here will be twofold: first, to build understanding and acceptance between its partners; second, to use this understanding to create a viable structure for the relationship. Both of these personalities are independent types, and if it is truly a relationship they want, they will have to learn to accept the rules and boundaries that will keep them together, and the expressions of resentment and anger that will have to be vented occasionally. Examining past failures is of limited value here—what is needed more is putting some kind of mechanism in place for solving problems, getting on with the present situation and, ultimately, preparing for a more enlightened future. Repeating the mistakes of the past is seldom a problem in this relationship, which has a capacity to expose the causes of problems and to create solutions.

In love relationships these two may trigger each other's sensitivities. The relationship is apt to bring out their passionate side, and they must be careful not to let corresponding negative emotions get out of control. Demonstrating a lack of realism and awareness, the pairing can prove a classic "In bed it's heaven, outside it's hell" situation. If what is desired is a total relationship rather than a crippled and selfish one, many hours of work on introspection and self-understanding will have to be shared.

Marriages are not the best idea for this combination, since Taurus-Gemini get nervous and Sagittarius I's impatient around each other on a daily basis. If such irritations can be overcome, however, the couple will often provide an energetic, loving and nurturing home for their children or pets. Friendships and working relationships can be fun, cordial and productive, but deep emotional involvements should be discouraged. Neither party is usually stable enough to guarantee such relationships the grounded quality they require. Family matchups, particularly parent-child relationships, feature stormy adolescent flare-ups and periods of adult estrangement, but bonds of love and trust may be forged later in life. At work, Sagittarius I's may find Taurus-Gemini disingenuous and Taurus-Gemini may find Sagittarius I's inflexible and demanding.

ADVICE: Forgive and forget. Move on. Go for the whole package. Don't hold back. You can have what you want, just be sure you know what it is.

THE WEEK OF THE ORIGINATOR
SAGITTARIUS II

The Road Less Traveled

The focus of this relationship usually lies far from the world of ambition and success: these two unusual types, perhaps criticized and rejected a great deal over the course of their lives, choose to take a less-traveled road together. Although both may be considered extroverts by the world's standards, in this relationship the focus is more inward, imaginative and spiritual. This does not mean that these two are less than professional in their careers—far from it. Money and power, however, are not what their relationship is about.

Love affairs between often outrageous types such as these are surprisingly muted. Personal and affectionate, the relationship shows a fascination for the bizarre and out of the ordinary in love and romance, but keeps it quiet—few could guess what goes on behind the windows and doors of their rendezvous. One can only guess that sexual attitudes here rule out no interesting approach, and that the pair are open to experimentation.

Marriages or permanent living situations may be built around the spiritual, religious or artistic beliefs of one or both of the mates. Important social outlets generally emerge from such connections, providing relief from an often hectic personal and domestic life. At certain periods, communal living may be tried, usually with good but not necessarily lasting results.

As friends, Taurus-Gemini and Sagittarius II's may attack their common leisure-time interests and activities with as much relish and energy as they do their respective careers or love affairs. Thus the friendship represents a chance not to relax and be accepted but to forge ahead together in pursuit of common goals. Sports, fitness, travel, books or new media—any or all of these are likely to attract this couple.

The career connection here is less strong unless it is connected with a friendship or marriage, or else with an all-consuming interest. Family relationships, especially sibling matchups, tend to fill the house with excitement and good humor. Taurus-Gemini and Sagittarius III's will appreciate this relationship because of mutual enthusiasm for their more unusual qualities.

ADVICE: Develop your social side. Bring a love of the spirit to others. Don't neglect career opportunities. Avoid getting too far out there.

A Strange Meld

Being misunderstood is characteristic of this combination. Others will often have difficulty understanding the attraction between two such different partners, and what keeps them together. They may feel the same way themselves—much in their relationship will be concerned with unearthing the truth about each other, and, in turn, with explaining themselves to the world. It's not that they don't want to understand each other, it's just that their energies and approaches are so different that it's hard for them even to begin. Sagittarius III's are weighty individuals, given to the contemplation of big issues, and are not particularly verbal; Taurus-Gemini, on the other hand, are chatty, suffer from foot-in-mouth syndrome and enjoy minutiae, details and nuance. But these opposites may meld and complement each other, forming a mysterious combination in which standards are rigorous, doing a job well is emphasized and expectations are firm.

Love affairs here are elusive. Powerful Sagittarius III's may be fascinated with a sparkling and optimistic Taurus-Gemini, who in turn may be attracted to this partner's stature and vision. But the Sagittarius III need to dominate in love may be resented by Taurus-Gemini, who need to remain free. Marriages similarly may be successful only if Taurus-Gemini are prepared to play a secondary role, which is hard for them. One positive aspect is that Sagittarius III depression and moodiness may be positively affected by bright and perky Taurus-Gemini, who know how to have a good time.

Friendships and family relationships can be extremely supportive. As friends or siblings, Taurus-Gemini and Sagittarius III's will be mutually protective, the former perhaps verbally and the latter physically. Furthermore, the relationship itself may prove a defender of the disadvantaged or impoverished, and helpful to weaker or shy family members. The pair's understanding of human nature may make others who likewise feel misunderstood by the world seek them out for advice. At work, Sagittarius III's may serve as excellent bosses or even managers for Taurus-Gemini.

ADVICE: Take the time to explain yourself. Being misunderstood is not an advantage. Cooperate, yet never give up your individuality. Balance extremes.

The Private Eye

The focus of this relationship is likely to be a privacy that goes beyond ordinary bounds, even tending to the reclusive. Sagittarius-Capricorns are likely to allow Taurus-Geminis to see a bit of the darker side of their personalities, one that they show to few others in their lives. Natural detectives, Taurus-Geminis will be intrigued to investigate further, but the relationship is likely to require them to forsake certain outgoing aspects of their nature so as to be alone in an intimate or domestic setting with the more introverted Sagittarius-Capricorn. Astrologically, Taurus-Gemini is an earth-air combination and Sagittarius-Capricorn fire-earth. The missing element is precisely the one that governs the relationship: water, symbolizing feeling.

Love and marriage between these two are tender, personal and emotional in nature. The emphasis here is on giving, and although both partners can gain much from each other, it is the Sagittarius-Capricorn who is likely to rise in stature in the eyes of the Taurus-Gemini, and through their relationship, much like the statue in George Bernard Shaw's Pygmalion and like Eliza Doolittle in My Fair Lady. Unfortunately, when the statue becomes real and comes down off its pedestal, the sculptor gets left in the lurch when his beautiful creation walks out the door. Attachments and subsequent breakups here can be extremely painful.

Friendships in this combination also have the capacity to be deep. Mutual friends often become involved in love triangles or quartets with this duo, and may eventually supplant one of the primary partners. Jealousies, claiming attitudes and competitive urges may easily arise and grow to unhealthy proportions.

Work relationships are not recommended here unless they guarantee near autonomy to both partners, a difficult requirement. Family relationships, especially father-daughter or mother-son matchups, may prove extremely influential in the lives of both individuals, sometimes becoming a dominating force that inhibits personal growth.

ADVICE: Beware of undue attachment. Don't turn your back on the world. Keep in touch. Danger lies in triangles. Remember who you are. Observe limits.

THE WEEK OF THE RULER
CAPRICORN I

Taking the Good with the Bad

The challenge of this combination is to be realistic. Although disappointment, conflict and difficulties of all sorts abound here, the relationship does tend to be open and honest, even blunt. Rarely will either party keep what is on his or her mind for long before airing their complaint. This doesn't mean that things can't go well here; many periods of good feeling and even ecstatic experiences manifest in Taurus-Gemini-Capricorn I relationships. Taking the good with the bad becomes a way of life here. There are two great threats to the relationship's health: breakdown of communication and loss of trust, the first more upsetting to the Taurus-Gemini and the latter to the Capricorn I.

Love affairs between these two can be deep but also unstable. If Capricorn I's get swept off their feet by an exciting and romantic Taurus-Gemini, it is usually only a matter of time before reality sets in and the relationship slows down or grinds to a halt. Should Taurus-Geminis stray from the relationship in its earlier stages and be found out, they may be surprised by the immediacy and severity of the Capricorn I response.

Marriages in this combination are painful to consider. Unless Capricorn I's are resigned to sitting at home and waiting into the wee hours for their busy Taurus-Gemini to come home, this one is best not attempted. Friendships and family relationships can be close and loving but also trying and difficult. This is particularly true of parent-child matchups. Being able to take the relationship for what it is, and to see it in a realistic light, stripped of illusions and symbolic projections, is a tough but worthwhile challenge for both partners.

In the professional sphere this relationship can work satisfactorily, with Taurus-Gemini personality and abundant energy gelling with Capricorn I practicality and good sense. These two generally do better working on the executive level or as business partners than as day-to-day co-workers, where conflicts are more likely to emerge.

ADVICE: Beware of getting carried away by unreality. Try to see straight. Accept the best and worst. Keep trust and communication alive.

Coming Down to Earth

This relationship can explore the far reaches of thought and fantasy, but will also ground itself in the here and now. The metaphor of dance suggests itself—leaping, literally flying, then returning to the ground to gather energy. The relationship usually shows enough sense to build itself around a practical endeavor in which both partners feel fulfilled in their work. Without this basis, they are likely to drift, or sometimes to try to escape from the demands of daily life altogether. The relationship has an air of unreality.

Taurus-Gemini can be swept away by the combination's fancifulness. They are on the flighty side to begin with, and the illusions spun here may be too much for them. Capricorn II's, on the other hand, always serious and usually laden with responsibilities, will initially be liberated by the matchup's imaginativeness, but may later try to exert control. Taurus-Gemini will bear the brunt of the relationship's amorphousness.

Charming and piquant, as a love affair the relationship is at first blush the very essence of romance. Yet it is eventually likely to be secretive and to exhibit neurotic symptoms of anxiety and worry. Marriage is usually more favorable: domestic tasks, financial planning and building a family can be the grounding influences the relationship requires. The best bet of all is probably friendship, which will feature a never-ending stream of ideas for things to do, both intellectual and physical. Such friends may well travel, exercise and work together. Good feelings, affection and gift-giving are characteristic here.

Siblings in this combination will seem as different as night and day, but their personalities can dovetail well. The dangers here are overdependence and a lack of individual development. Differences of temperament in parent-child combinations (Capricorn II serious and demanding, Taurus-Gemini fun-loving and flexible) may establish a contentious but rarely boring family dynamic. Since the relationship does well grounding itself in daily activities, career matchups are favored. These two can work side by side for years and still maintain their individuality. They will constitute an effective unit for getting the job done efficiently and dependably.

ADVICE: Keep in touch with daily demands. Be responsible but don't forget to dream. Master fear and anxiety. Don't suppress affection.

Pure Lines

This couple can devote themselves to aesthetic appreciation, whether of art, music, literature or the grace of dance and sports. Their taste runs in the direction of clean pure lines and functional beauty. The relationship brings out the more practical side of Taurus-Gemini and the more artistic side of Capricorn III's. It can be a powerful one when figuring out the best way to get a project initiated or finished. The fusion of Taurus-Gemini swiftness and eclectic strengths with Capricorn III power and purposefulness can create an unstoppable combination.

Love relationships between these two will be strongly physical. Both sexual and sensuous activities will blossom. The couple's aesthetic appreciation of these activities should not be underestimated. Capricorn III's will initially find Taurus-Gemini fascinating and a real challenge to hold on to. Taurus-Gemini will benefit from Capricorn III solidity, practicality and dependability.

Marriage can work out, but many of the partners' more personal attributes will prove mutually irritating or disturbing. Although Taurus-Gemini can entertain serious Capricorn III's at the end of a long hard day, they may also prove too talkative and mentally frenetic. Capricorn III practical demands may also be too much for them to handle on a day-to-day basis.

Family relationships are extremely complex, especially between mother and son or father and daughter. Adoration, even worship in childhood may cause undue attachments that will be extremely difficult to break later in life, particularly at the beginning of young adulthood. Should both live long enough, they may make peace and grow close once again. Work relationships are most favored here. It is quite possible for Taurus-Gemini-Capricorn III friends to go into business together. Not only getting the job done, not matter how successfully, but the joys of sharing struggles and achievements with a close friend make this relationship special. Capricorn III dominance usually does not emerge as an issue here. Taurus-Gemini flexibility may be bewildering at times, but Capricorn III's will ultimately realize its benefits for their joint projects.

ADVICE: Enjoy yourselves but get the job done. Don't get distracted from the work at hand. Keep feelings under control. Try to be more efficient.

Going Over the Edge

This relationship is expected to be an easy one because of its trine aspect (120° apart in the zodiac), and these two may indeed have lots of fun together. The zaniest and wildest projects, plans or activities are likely to manifest here. The pair will appear highly extroverted in the eyes of the world, engaged in daring but at times crazy endeavors. This can be a danger, for the psychological stability of both partners is not innately high, and activities that are too demanding or unsafe could push one or both of them over the edge. Thus the relationship serves as a test of mature behavior and of the ability to balance excessive drives. The trick would be for both parties strictly to maintain their own individuality, and to bring to bear the personal strength they share—a highly developed and practical faculty for critical analysis.

Friendships and love affairs, although vivid and exciting, may suffer from often unconscious competitiveness. Both Taurus-Gemini and Capricorn-Aquarians love the spotlight and at times are unaware that they are jockeying for position. Because of their often colorful, flamboyant and charismatic natures, both of these partners are likely to attract many admirers; should such attractions prove too tempting, this can lead to jealousy and ultimately to grief. Yet possessiveness and claiming behavior are not necessarily characteristic here, and a tolerant or openly permissive attitude that allows moderate involvement with others, often in the name of enrichment or revitalization, can prove rewarding.

Marital, work and family relationships between Taurus-Gemini and Capricorn-Aquarians often benefit from a group's structure and support systems. Being around others may have a balancing effect, working to prevent wilder energies from getting out of hand. As spouses and parents, a Taurus-Gemini-Capricorn-Aquarius couple will have good times with their children, taking them on fine holidays and supporting activities outside their school syllabus. Parent-child relationships in this combination, however, may not be stable enough to work to either partner's benefit, and are often undermined by unrealistic expectations on both sides.

ADVICE: Let up in your need for attention. Try to understand it. Put your many talents to use in the service of others. Share. Develop patience and understanding.

Thrillingly Romantic

Air is the ruling element of this relationship, emphasizing thought, reasoning and connection. Reinforcing its partners' mental sides, the relationship tends toward perfectionism and is sensitive to the beauty in mathematics, logic and design. The problem is that it may apply these attitudes according to a double standard, being quite blind about its own lack of logic. Reserving critical scrutiny for others, in its enthusiasm and optimism the relationship may lose the ability to see itself and its goals clearly.

Love affairs are likely to be wild and unsettled. Neither Taurus-Gemini nor Aquarius I is known for stability in this area, and their coalescence here can get pretty chaotic. On the other hand, the relationship's excitement, sexual tension and energetic expression can sometimes be thrillingly romantic. Since freedom and infidelity are also magnified here, marriage is not especially recommended.

If these two are looking for a friendship with few responsibilities and a great capacity for fun, this is it. The sky's the limit for adventure and exploration of all types, and the strong mental connection points to board and video games, puzzles, Internet or computer involvement and possible interests in virtual reality or psychic phenomena. This can be a bit of a fair-weather friendship, however, lacking depth, and with the partners becoming less interested in each other during times of need. Financial responsibilities also tend to be a bit lax.

Family relationships can be close here, particularly between siblings of the same sex. Some kind of telepathic ability is not at all uncommon, and empathic connections are to be expected. Parent-child relationships tend toward the permissive, with both Aquarius I and Taurus-Gemini parents trying to encourage their child's freedom.

Working relationships that effectively utilize this pair's mind power can be highly successful. But employers may have to keep an eye on the Taurus-Gemini's financial irresponsibility and the Aquarius I's somewhat flaky judgments.

ADVICE: Calm down. Beware of double standards. Be more self-critical. Even out your emotions. Enthusiasm can be deadly. Keep your eye on the ball.

THE WEEK OF YOUTH & EASE
AQUARIUS II

Silver Bells and Cockle Shells

This relationship summons up images of a childhood kingdom in which young people play in paradisaical surroundings. These partners may live in their own world, oblivious to everything but their own imaginations. Especially prominent is the living out of fantasies, which may assume a significance greater than society is prepared to acknowledge. In fact, others may see this couple as a bit bizarre and out of touch with reality. Should they work in an artistic, academic or business field, however, their efforts may be applauded.

Love relationships are often covert, and the feelings underlying them may themselves have been kept secret for years before the affair's start. These feelings may have manifested as fantasies, or may have been completely unconscious. The moment when these soulmates come together is exciting, of course, but not necessarily dramatic, seeming almost a fated inevitability. The Aquarius II will want to be certain the relationship is what the Taurus-Gemini really wants; the Taurus-Gemini may be taking a "Here's my chance" or "Now or never" attitude. These relationships can continue for years, even through changes of primary partners, living situations and family fortunes. Marriage seldom seems to be in the cards here; should it occur, however, it may succeed, although friends and family may never fully accept it.

As siblings or other family pairs, these two will seem extremely close. Their absolute refusal to stick to traditional family roles may confuse the rest of the family, or make them jealous. At work they can be strikingly successful, particularly in one of the more imaginative kinds of commercial enterprise. They do better as executive colleagues or business partners than as office or plant co-workers. Should the relationship emerge in a research and development group or in the marketing sector, it may develop innovative discoveries and methods. Teacher-student relationships can also be outstanding. As adult friends, these two may have as much fun as kids. Unself-conscious in the extreme, Taurus-Gemini and Aquarius II's can gain enormous pleasure from music, cuisine or the entertainment of a small group of family or intimates.

ADVICE: Take a closer look at yourself. Beware of delusions and of hurting others. Find what is really of value. Think constructively.

THE WEEK OF ACCEPTANCE
AQUARIUS III

High-Strung Thoroughbred

This demanding relationship operates at a high level, but a stressful one. The perfection demanded here will improve the quality of daily life in general but may undermine it in any given instance, engendering nervousness and pressure. An attitude of merciless self-criticism may also be operative, with old scripts producing self-fulfilling prophecies ("You'll never be any good at that"). A positive attitude may be continually undercut.

The relationship's undeniable social drive favors friendships and marriages. Both Aquarius III's and Taurus-Gemini have a strongly gregarious side that must be expressed, and their matchup synergistically reinforces this tendency. In consequence, their relationship has to be defined willy-nilly in terms of others, whether family members, social groups, colleagues or friends. When social demands become too intrusive, however, resentment and resistance can arise between them, especially in Aquarius III's, who have a strong private side.

Love affairs between these two tend to be highly accepting and supportive. Although Aquarius III's are easily irritated, Taurus-Gemini have a way of lightening the mood and in general staying objective without overreacting. On the other hand, they also want to be the center of attention, a need that proud and self-occupied Aquarius III's may not satisfy, possibly causing frustration. Whether the relationship is passionate or platonic, it may be enduring and rewarding, but both partners will need to keep their nervous temperaments under control on a day-to-day basis.

Parent-child relationships here are complex. Taurus-Gemini parents tend to lay on guilt trips and in general to meddle too much in the lives of their Aquarius III children, who will react violently against such behavior. Aquarius III parents, on the other hand, tend to make their Taurus-Gemini children anxious and hysterical. Yet this relationship can be extremely affectionate, supportive and loving, with long periods of easy contact only occasionally being disrupted by an explosive reaction to a sharp remark, glance or critical observation. Working relationships are not recommended, since both parties have their own approaches.

ADVICE: Cool down. Don't let your buttons be pushed. Voices from the past must be silenced. Learn to compromise. Aim for a balanced social life.

Is the Spotlight Big Enough?

Conflict over who gets attention may mark this relationship. The partners are very different—one objective and extroverted, the other subjective and introverted—but both have a tremendous need for attention, both from each other and from friends and family. They are sure to come into conflict over who gets to be the star, particularly since their differing approaches will prevent them from understanding each other's desires—nor will they even see their own clearly. Should they work together on this issue they may make an effective team; by sharing the spotlight they can avoid conflict, particularly if they attribute their success to the relationship. If not, success can prove divisive, provoking envy and resentment. The square aspect of Taurus-Gemini and Aquarius-Pisces in the zodiac (they are 90° apart) in this case indicates tension and arguments, but also excitement, and encouragement to the partners to do better.

Love affairs are perhaps best kept that way: marriage may place excessive responsibility on these freedom-loving partners. Problems arise when neither Taurus-Gemini nor Aquarius-Pisces have formed a strong ego, for their desire to please each other may be repeatedly frustrated. In fact they may flounder together in a sea of unresolved and uncertain feelings, reacting somewhat purposelessly to the latest stimulus, with little long-range benefit.

Competitiveness may prevent these two from becoming close friends. But semicompetitive matchups—as sports partners or as game opponents—may express such rivalries productively, as long as each person can be the winner often enough.

Parent-child relationships may prove overwhelming, especially father-daughter and mother-son pairs. Rebellion often appears here, but there is also a great need to love. Sibling relationships of the same sex are bright, lively and entertaining (but also distracting) to other family members. These two can work well as colleagues or business partners. A product or service that combines their strengths can sweep the field. Breakups are especially debilitating here—the partners may need a great deal of time and effort to find their feet again.

ADVICE: Know what you want and who you are. Beware of eagerness to please. Be less demanding of attention. Control competitive drives.

THE WEEK OF SPIRIT
PISCES I

Sparkling Exchanges

This undeniably flamboyant relationship may focus on social or intellectual issues or on an area of shared interest. These two make a scintillating combination, full of wit, good humor and spirit. Pisces I's have a tremendous need for the respect of Taurus-Gemini, who are similarly anxious to impress this partner with their achievements. Neither partner is likely to try to dominate the other, but an element of friendly competitiveness may be a constant.

More oriented toward thought than toward physicality, the matchup is not strongly suggested for love or marriage. Satisfactory platonic involvements are quite possible here, however, with sympathy and affection being openly expressed. Such relationships are characterized by interesting discussions and supportive attitudes.

Friendships have a bit more bite. Partners feel free to criticize each other and to indulge in amusing or insulting banter. Wit, irony, sarcasm and humor all vie for the ascendancy. These two may often be involved in an artistic endeavor, often featuring music, writing or design.

In family matchups, particular father-son and mother-daughter, close sharing breaks down boundaries but can also result in drift and lack of direction. The partners' involvement can become so total that both of them forget about practical matters like cooking dinner and paying the bills. Families will be enriched by this duo, but may tire of being forced to watch and listen to their sparkling exchanges.

Work relationships in this combination, particularly when the partners are executives or business partners, can work only if they acknowledge financial priorities and put their fiscal transactions firmly in the hands of the more capable member, usually Pisces I. Taurus-Gemini enthusiasm is sometimes likely to be highly unrealistic and damaging to any shared project, and it may be difficult for the Pisces I to explain the problem. On the other hand, Taurus-Gemini may grow tired of having to walk on eggs around sensitive Pisces I's, who are liable to turn on their heel and exit when treated insultingly or uninterestedly.

ADVICE: Be aware of the existence of others. Talking is one thing, doing another. Keep your eye on the goal. Fight a tendency to drift. Hang tough.

THE WEEK OF THE LONER
PISCES II

Untrodden Avenues

Taurus-Gemini and Pisces II's can form extremely close bonds. Particularly in their personal relationships, they may seek to go beyond the bounds of convention, exploring untrodden avenues of the soul. Together they are pioneers of the human spirit, and recognize few barriers to emotional investigation. Taurus-Gemini are ruled by earth and air, Pisces II's by water, but their combination is governed by fire, symbolizing intuition, passion and perseverance. Thus the two partners and their relationship effect a balance of all four elements.

Relying on intuition, Taurus-Gemini–Pisces II friendships proceed on hunches. Although usually well informed on subjects of shared interest, these two prefer to fly by the seat of their pants, eschewing book learning and dry academic explanations. They want to find things out for themselves, testing their intuitions in the hot crucible of experience. These relationships very often grow so close that love and familial feeling are expressed quite naturally here.

Love affairs and marriages are less successful than might be expected. The couple's sexual needs and wants are not always compatible, and even when such relationships are at their most successful, they can reveal themselves as friendships in disguise. They also often ignore or neglect domestic responsibilities and daily routines in favor of more personal interactions, resulting in chaotic messes that eventually demand cleaning up.

Sibling relationships, especially of the same sex, can be extremely protective and supportive. This is particularly true when a parent or other adult lacks understanding or is abusive. Parent-child relationships in this combination, on the other hand, usually fail to supply the attention and patience necessary for the nurturing process to take place. Working relationships are very difficult if financial success is the primary goal. Neither party is usually efficient or businesslike enough to carry on the maintenance work needed here. On the personal level, moreover, a Taurus-Gemini may resent a Pisces II co-worker's dreaminess, while the Pisces II may dislike the Taurus-Gemini's outgoing and flamboyant persona.

ADVICE: Don't neglect daily chores. Brilliance won't pay the bills. Keep emotions under control. Put hunches to practical use. Love should not grow old.

THE WEEK OF DANCERS & DREAMERS
PISCES III

The Realm of Ideas

This relationship often makes a specialty of ideas. The partners are sympathetic to each other, but emotion is not the keynote here; they are more absorbed by philosophical discussions, or simpler talks about the sociology of everyday life. Activities like taking regular walks or sitting at a café or coffee shop and discussing the week's events are accorded special importance. A major theme in this discourse is holding the tension between two opposites, finding the harmony in incongruence, living with ambiguity. This is no small task, but these two can talk and talk, and that is how they approach the job.

Taurus-Gemini–Pisces III friendships and marriages are apt to be convivial. Entertaining mutual friends at home—tastefully, but often with innovative touches—and engaging in hilarious or occasionally serious discussions over food and wine (real thought and time will have gone into the meal's selection and preparation) can become major social activities. Family gatherings on birthdays and holidays may also be counted on for fun and good feelings. More philosophical discussions are likely to be left until late at night, when the two are alone and can debate a subject fully without being bound by social constraints.

Love affairs between these two are somewhat uncommon. Both Taurus-Gemini and Pisces III's generally give themselves passionately to people very different from themselves, even barely known strangers. Their empathic feelings for each other often preclude such unbalanced yet exciting encounters. Family relationships favor sibling matchups, especially brother-sister pairs, which can exhibit telepathic abilities. At work these two can make a vital team. When both are graduates of the school of hard knocks—basically self-taught, or educated by their own experience more than by any formal schooling—between them they can cover a large range of expertise. The relationship exudes self-confidence, based firmly on the Taurus-Gemini's people skills and the Pisces III's practical and imaginative abilities. These coalesce well, especially in more dramatic and adventurous projects. Immodesty and feelings of infallibility will have to be guarded against, however.

ADVICE: Never lose the good feeling, but be critical, too. Don't dream (or drink) your life away. Beware of self-satisfaction. Continue lively debate.

May 25–June 2

THE WEEK OF FREEDOM
GEMINI I

Anything Goes?

This lively relationship is unlikely to last long, if, indeed, it ever really gets started. These two can cooperate with and admire each other, but they also reinforce each other's need for freedom, and a relationship that focuses on opposition to restrictions may undercut its own chances of survival. Should freedom-loving Gemini I's be able to adopt an anything-goes outlook, they might have a chance to make their relationship work. Alas, this is often impossible—a secret tyrant dwells in many Gemini I breasts.

Gemini I love affairs are often intense and fleeting. Recognizing a kindred soul, the pair may make brief contacts whenever they have time, but not much more. Their marriages are hard to hold together, to the point where it is surprising to find them at all; live-in situations and long-term love affairs are more usual. These partners have a need to impose their ideas on each other, and in a situation of daily contact the disagreements can quickly become intolerable. Quick, strong-minded and willful, Gemini I spouses are unlikely to see each other's point of view or to express much sympathy for each other's feelings. Should they engage their fighting instinct on behalf of the relationship, however, they may be able to craft a situation that is open-ended enough to be workable for them.

Friendships have a good chance as long as their demands are not too heavy. They are not of the deepest sort, and may function best as partnerships in a particular project or activity, perhaps sporting or educational. Gemini I parent-child and sibling matchups are likely to be stormy, neither partner really giving the other the respect or stability they need. Relationships between somewhat distant relatives—grandparents and grandchildren, cousins, or aunts or uncles with nieces or nephews—are usually the most interesting, warm and exciting here.

Work relationships in this combination can work out, particularly if they demand technical expertise. Most Gemini I's are uncomfortable staying in the same job year after year, but as co-workers in this kind of position, they may offer each other ironic consolation.

ADVICE: Quiet down. Pay more attention to feelings. Tune in to intuitions. Let go of your combative stance. Try to cooperate. Lessen friction.

Chewing What You Bite

This relationship may make its participants pursue unusual experiences in order to further their own development. As a couple they are much more intuitive than they are individually. Mentally oriented, separately they operate in a quick-witted sort of way, often acting brashly on their first idea. Together, though, they can examine the issues, think things through and rationally envision the results of their actions—assuming that they sit still long enough to put their heads together rather than jumping into the deep end first. Since they favor large-scale endeavors, it is vital that they engage their synergistic capacity for seeing the big picture. Otherwise they may be biting off more than they can chew.

In love affairs, this couple may be objectively well suited in many ways. Despite their mercurial mutual strengths (speedy, communicative, clever), however, Gemini II's long for a quiet, deep, powerful partner—perhaps a projection of their own dark side. There is a conflict between what they may need (a Gemini I rather like themselves) and what they want (a shadow projection, their opposite). Gemini I's can become quite frustrated over this, especially since they know things should be going well here.

Marriages in this combination may be interesting, filled with activity, travel and interest. Surprisingly stable, they can last for years, brimming with vivacity, before the partners begin to tire of each other. Neither of these two is well grounded, but Gemini I's are usually the more practical of the two, and may grow impatient with Gemini II lack of focus. Still, the relationship's emotional instabilities can often be resolved through dedication to a large-scale project, such as raising children.

Gemini I–Gemini II friendships are original in their approach, but they may not be strong enough to unite these two in a bond that will overcome their individual flightiness. Work and family relationships may offer those around them little peace: whether the partners are getting along or not, the noise level may prove intolerable. The solution can be virtually locking them up and letting them work things out in private.

ADVICE: Be considerate of others. Find a place to be alone. Beware of exhibitionistic tendencies. Quiet down. Meditate. Turn off the motor.

GEMINI I

June 11–18

THE WEEK OF THE SEEKER
GEMINI III

Verbal Bombardment

These personalities' tendency to talk at rather than with each other can make meaningful communication difficult in this combination. The relationship amplifies their garrulousness, allowing them little rest from a verbal bombardment that often precludes listening. Communication is so important here partly because both partners are Gemini's—but they are Gemini's of very different kinds. Gemini I's are quick-witted, jumping from thought to thought. This sorely irritates Gemini III's, who dislike channel-surfing, preferring to explore a subject deeply and then say a lot about it, often too much for a Gemini I's patience. Accordingly, one often sees these two blabbing away without real connection. Finding a way to communicate, whether verbally, emotionally or in writing, is the first step to understanding here.

The easiest language for Gemini I's and III's to understand may be the language of love: silent looks, tender caresses or outright flaming passion may all prove effective means of communication. These are rarely enough, however, to replace the need for verbal expression, and breakdowns are bound to occur.

Marital and work partnerships will have to convey information more literally, and here the partners may be able to evolve their own shorthand of idiosyncratic expressions and speech—in short, a language for the discussion of everyday matters. To the extent that this language may be highly original, it may be hard for other family members or colleagues to understand.

Friendships in this combination may work best if based on action, which usually tells its own story. Dangerous expeditions (real or imagined), fascinating investigations (in books or real life), and the more challenging side of life in general attracts this relationship like a magnet. In the family, this sibling pair, especially if of opposite sexes, often has an easy familiarity, each instinctively understanding the other's feelings. Gemini I–Gemini III parent-child combinations will have to work hard to correct misunderstandings. As co-workers, these two may lack the time to develop their own language. The result is a loss of efficiency.

ADVICE: Listening is necessary for communication. Beware foolhardiness. Remember that others may find you confusing. Take the time to explain. Slow down.

THE CUSP OF MAGIC

Furthering Expansive Endeavors

This fascinating relationship may feature participation in large-scale projects and a striving for monumental goals, though not always realistic ones. This pair attend to the world at large, and all that represents it—books, philosophies, political movements, theater. The partners sometimes need to take an adversarial stance to each other, for through conflict they can achieve results beyond the grasp of either of them alone. There are acute temperamental differences between the rawer energies of Gemini I's and the more sophisticated and refined approach of Gemini-Cancers.

Although Gemini I's may seem the more aggressive of these two, Gemini-Cancers are often more so, if subtly. They take this stance simply to get something other than cool rationality out of the Gemini I. In love affairs, such conflicts may lead to pleasurable resolutions, but Gemini I's will ultimately tire of the mental energy required to maintain the relationship. Only after the affair has ended will Gemini-Cancers fully appreciate their ex-lover's electric energies.

Gemini-Cancers can offer a peaceful home life to Gemini I spouses, who, however, will probably only upset this domestic tranquillity in return. But Gemini I's can bring worldly benefit to the marriage, particularly in terms of social contacts, an eye for bargains, and handy shortcuts in official matters. Their roving eye may prove a problem, but Gemini-Cancers may be sufficiently enchanted with this interesting partner to keep the relationship going, demonstrating a romanticism, devotion and refined emotional nature that may hold the Gemini I's attention far longer than usual. In friendships and at work, these two may be able to meld their different temperaments in the service of an idealistic common cause requiring vision and dedication. Along the way, combative tendencies may arise that can be very hard to sublimate into more constructive channels; the trick is to turn these impulses into the kind of striving that fuels shared causes and furthers expansive endeavors. Parent-child matchups are likely to work best with nurturing Gemini-Cancers in the parental role.

ADVICE: Tone down combative stances. Put competitive drives to constructive use. Scale back your horizons a bit. Attend to daily tasks.

A Mutual Search

Embedded within this relationship is a desire to seek the answers to broad questions, such as discovering the reasons for life's events, or trying to find one's place in the world—questions that in some way often relate back to the individual. This pair may engage in activities that generate either experience or educational opportunities. Interestingly, even though the quest is shared, the questions and therefore the answers will be different for each partner. Cancer I's will want to know the reasons for their feelings, Gemini I's will want to expand their awareness of how they think. The relationship's search may ultimately be for personal values that these two can share.

Love affairs can start off well, but may quickly nose-dive when independent Gemini I's fly off to their next adventure, leaving the Cancer I sitting at home, bored and unhappy. When the Gemini I finally calls, the Cancer I's reply will be full of guilt-inducing pain. Consolation, kissing and making up will work until the predictable cycle begins once again. Married Gemini I's are usually out in the world doing their thing, while Cancer I's ensure that the home is well kept, well repaired and in general a comfortable retreat. The combination can work out well, then, especially in the practical sphere, since Gemini I efficiency and Cancer I money sense are an effective combination. Building domestic situations together, or seeking value in a religious or spiritual pursuit or success in a mutual career endeavor, fulfills some of the relationship's needs. But emotionally the relationship can be a disaster, and all these wonderful plans may grind to a halt as Cancer I's fall into a pit of despair and Gemini I's stand by helplessly, nervous and acutely frustrated. Tensions rise, arguments and resentments fly and painful breakdowns result.

Friendships and family relationships usually polarize Gemini I–Cancer I differences rather than synergizing their strengths. Critical attitudes emerge that exercise mental faculties and encourage game-playing rather than yielding sympathy or relaxation. These relationships rarely bring harmony to a family or circle of friends.

ADVICE: Beware of emotional manipulation. Deal with guilt and shame. Seek a more open and joyful approach to life. Don't get stuck.

The Shadow Side

Gemini I's are rarely sensitive or sympathetic enough to give Cancer II's the kind of emotional understanding they need, and Cancer II's will rarely be amenable to the Gemini I desire to lay down the rules for living. Where, then, is this relationship's meeting ground? The answer lies in dark and hidden areas that these two might never approach in their relationships with others. The shadow side of human experience exerts a seductive pull here, uniting this duo in a search for the unusual. Whether through a Gemini I's fascination with an unconventional Cancer II, or through the Cancer II's amazement at the Gemini I's dormant awareness of his or her own shadow personality, the relationship seeks to explore the darker depths of experience. These two may show great interest in unusual happenings, circumstances and people, not just investigating them but seeking to become involved with hidden, perhaps prophetic or metaphysical powers.

In love and marriage the relationship is unlikely to ignore the mysterious aspects of sex, or to hold back from exploring this area in unusual ways—the tantra, for example. To Gemini I's who have been content to live at a more superficial level of existence, particularly in matters of love, such a relationship may prove a little threatening yet at the same time fascinating. Cancer II's may feel more at home here, even taking the lead, something to which Gemini I's may not be accustomed. Fishing in these deep emotional waters, however, is not without its dangers, especially when monsters of the psyche are roused from the depths.

In the family and at work, the anger, disapproval and aggression of Gemini I's and the hurt, withdrawal and claiming attitudes of Cancer II's must be resolved if the relationship is to prove productive. Addiction can sometimes be an issue in friendships, which may be enjoyable and fun but mask deep needs for affection and security. Alcohol, tobacco and mind-expanding or tranquilizing drugs may be involved. Unfortunately, the relationship may lack the self-control necessary to limit the use of such substances.

ADVICE: Don't get in over your head. Beware of addictive tendencies. Apply what you learn to life. Increase human understanding. Share with others.

Pleasurable Capitulation

Highlighting its partners' charisma, this relationship can be magnetic and extremely persuasive in getting its way in the world. Creatively these two can accomplish a lot, since any artistic and even social endeavors they are engaged in usually have that extra-special something, that magic. This goes far in keeping them together. Manipulation and persuasion are their fortes as individuals, and their relationship magnifies these abilities, which is all well and good as long as they use them in pursuit of external goals. Games within the relationship, however, can prove destructive. Any battle that shapes up will pit a consummate Gemini I role-player against an emotionally savvy Cancer III. Ultimately, the Gemini I will prove no match for this partner's ability to get his or her way. Cancer III's will sometimes be irritated by the nervous chattiness of Gemini I's, who would do well to try to be more grounded.

Love affairs clearly reveal the ability of Cancer III's to determine the relationship's course: if attracted to a Gemini I, they will not be deterred. Gemini I's may shine and dazzle, but Cancer III's can zero in immediately on their insecurities and vulnerabilities, especially emotional ones. Should marriage be the Cancer III goal, the Gemini I, though ordinarily a hankerer after freedom, will probably recognize the benefits of domestic life with this capable partner and capitulate pleasurably. The relationship may ultimately prove lopsided: the Cancer III will rule the roost. Cancer III parents may view a gifted Gemini I child as excellent raw material to shape to their will. The child, however, may rebel against this controlling attitude. Gemini I parents generally occupy a magical position in the eyes of their Cancer III children, who may deceive themselves about these elusive individuals and ultimately face disappointment. Both partners will value friendships and working arrangements in this combination: melding their talents in social or business projects, these relationships can infuse a wide variety of endeavors with an extra pizzazz. Whether attracting others to their cause or lining up clients, these two specialize in convincing others of their ability to get the job done.

ADVICE: Let others make up their own minds. Try not to be so pushy. Controlling and claiming attitudes can backfire. Establish more meaningful values.

THE CUSP OF OSCILLATION

Guiding the Boomerang

This relationship needs stability. Although these two have somewhat similar energies, tyrannical tendencies emerge here, as well as mutability and a sense of unsettledness. This makes each partner nervous, even when they are apart, and when they are together the discomfort and insecurity multiply unbearably. In an attempt to create order, one or the other of them will try to dominate, Gemini I's passively, by digging in their heels, and Cancer-Leos aggressively, by making demands. Cancer-Leos will generally be more irritated by Gemini I's than vice versa, for Gemini I's represent to them what they fear in themselves: their own qualities of distractedness or flakiness. It is Cancer-Leos who are apt to be the tyrants here, as their own insecurities boomerang.

Cancer-Leos are attracted to unpredictable individuals like Gemini I's, and insecurity only makes their love affairs burn brighter. Unless the relationship can galvanize practical energies, however, its passion may sweep it away. Cancer-Leos can never be sure of this particular lover's extracurricular activities, nor can Gemini I's predict a Cancer-Leo's moods. An exciting Gemini I may trigger a Cancer-Leo's psychological instability, sending him or her over the edge. Dedication will be needed on both sides to prevent early burnout or eventual catastrophe.

Working partnerships, marriages and friendships in this combination have difficulty over the question of responsibility. Whether in the workplace or at home, the partners are clever enough to see what is needed materially, and they are often technically gifted enough to set out to get it. But Gemini I's may tire of repetitive tasks and responsibility, and their longing to breathe free will make Cancer-Leos extremely nervous. Insecurities like this one may be the biggest problem these two face. Parent-child relationships in this combination may be highly positive and productive. Sibling matchups are often unstable and disruptive to family life; wise parents will give them joint responsibilities and accept no individual excuses. Being forced to hold up their end of the bargain collectively may induce cooperation and lessen strife.

ADVICE: Be realistic in taking on responsibility. Work more efficiently. Don't let personal matters intrude. Balance emotional instabilities. Consider the role of projection.

THE WEEK OF AUTHORITY

Taken for Granted

The outside world views this relationship as sparkling and radiant. Gemini (an air sign) and Leo (a fire sign) combine in an explosive mix, especially in romantic and sexual interaction. There is also an ease of interaction here that promotes ease in others. Yet the relationship is governed by the element of water, associated with feeling, and its focus is empathic. This points to the relationship's more private side, which the world is not permitted to see.

Feeling and emotion often swirl in love relationships between these two, but are ultimately kept under control by their good sense and objectivity. Both of them tend to be detached and cool in personal matters; the relationship magnifies this trait, making it hard for them to admit to the depths of their feelings—which are capable of being extremely deep and passionate. Further, although empathy is high between them, they may ignore or even use it as a manipulative weapon to gain ascendancy. This can be the relationship's central tragedy, cutting off its best part for the sake of control and power.

The relationship's objectivity may speak better in marriage than in a transitory love affair. Both partners are more likely to hold fast to the former than to the latter, and can even come to depend on it as the anchor in their lives. The security of marriage, however, does not guarantee faithfulness or monogamy; both Gemini I's and Leo I's are likely to stray. Were their confidence in their relationship less great, they might remain more faithful, albeit frustrated. Although neither member is known for nurturing capabilities and devotion to children, their matchup synergistically boosts these tendencies—the pair can make excellent parents.

Friendships and work and sibling matchups are unlikely to be harmonious here. Leo I's usually demand more in such relationships than Gemini I's are prepared to give. Furthermore, the lion will give of its legendary steadfastness and faithfulness only up to a point, that point being the moment when he feels a less responsible person, possibly a Gemini I, is taking advantage.

ADVICE: Be more honest about your feelings. Beware of control and power trips. Never take your relationship for granted. Discharge responsibilities.

August 3–10

THE WEEK OF BALANCED STRENGTH
LEO II

Hanging In There

The success of this relationship will depend on the Gemini I's ability to acknowledge the Leo II as the boss in appropriate situations. If this is impossible, a rocky road lies ahead for these two, assuming they wish to travel it. Both partners may be so determined to make this relationship work, however, that they will be willing to compromise. Thus Leo II's will be understanding of the Gemini I need for freedom, and of this partner's penchant for criticizing and making demands, while Gemini I's may give way to Leo II's when a leader is required, meanwhile keeping hold of the reins of power through planning and behind-the-scenes decision-making. These two may see eye-to-eye on fighting injustice or oppression. When united on this front, they can be unstoppable.

Romantic relationships here can be satisfying for both partners, particularly in the sexual sphere. Leo II's are demanding and will put Gemini I stamina to the test. Not at all understanding of infidelity, they will also keep a tight leash on Gemini I's, who will not enjoy facing their ultimatums. If anyone is guilty of a double standard, however, it may well be the Leo II: flexible Gemini I's are probably more compromising and forgiving.

In marriages and work partnerships Leo II's will hold up their end of the bargain and expect Gemini I's to do the same. This may or may not be wise, for too often a Gemini I will tend to lean on this powerful partner to get things done. Moreover, Leo II's can be long-suffering, and even if one day they realize they have made a bad choice in a frivolous or scattered Gemini I, they will often hang in there and continue to shoulder the relationship's responsibilities. Leo II's may actually prefer Gemini I's to be absent a lot of the time. Arguments over money are likely to plague this pairing.

Friendships and sibling relationships can work out well for these two, as long as Gemini I complaining or criticism does not push patient Leo II's beyond their limit.

ADVICE: Try being more diplomatic. Compromise can make the impossible possible. Be aware of your limitations. Insist on equal participation.

THE WEEK OF FREEDOM

August 11–18

THE WEEK OF LEADERSHIP
LEO III

Former Enemies, Former Friends

The aggressiveness of both these partners is likely to mask or supplant this relationship's more intimate aspects. Verbal and even physical encounters are likely, especially between young siblings and friends. Combative attitudes may be sublimated into healthy competition, or simply expressed in ironic and sarcastic banter. Put-downs of this kind can be dangerous if they result in a lowered self-image, which becomes more probable when parents or teachers utter them to their children or students. Both parties will need to be tough to survive in this relationship, but a realistic attitude urges those who can't stand the heat to get out of the kitchen.

Love affairs are likely to be scorchingly intense, even destructive. If the partners can get out of this relationship psychologically intact, they will go on to future liaisons wiser and more experienced. In marriage they are unlikely to be able to agree on who is boss, or to make the necessary compromises. Air-fire combinations like this one (Gemini being an air sign, Leo fire) can be dangerously explosive, with outbursts of anger common. But if the anger is suppressed, a Leo III depression may result, or the Gemini I may escape into drugs or drink. The use of sex as an outlet may work for a while, but will ultimately prove frustrating and futile. One solution is for each of the partners to establish an inviolable supremacy in their own important life areas, and to limit their shared activities to mundane ones that do not require strong leadership.

Friends and work colleagues may be former rivals or competitors whom mutual respect and changing fortunes have washed up on the same side. These relationships may also go in the other direction, however, with respect disappearing. No one would describe this relationship as "nice"—no love seems to be lost here. Yet it is honest and candid, and its partners wouldn't want it any other way. Their mutual dislike of pretense and phoniness underline this point.

ADVICE: Translate combat into competition. Play by the rules. Your enemy may be a friend in disguise. Agree on areas of expertise. Minimize stress.

THE CUSP OF EXPOSURE
LEO-VIRGO CUSP

Winning a Fair Fight

The focus of the relationship between these very different personalities can well be a drive toward success, whether as individuals or as a pair. Whatever ambition they have individually the relationship synergistically increases. It is most effective as a successful business partnership, or as an aspiring marriage or parent-child relationship. Although Gemini I's tend to be more direct and Leo-Virgos more secretive in accomplishing their ends, together they simply carry on, pragmatically and purposefully, neither demanding nor shunning the attention of others.

Gemini I–Leo-Virgo love affairs are unlikely to be effective, particularly if they lack this focus of ambition. Pure pleasure is rarely a lasting interest for this pair, and sexual encounters may often pan out as brief flings. Gemini I's are unlikely to understand or respect this partner's intense need for privacy, not realizing that a single Leo-Virgo confidence broken is likely to be the last one shared. In marriage, career and family, the relationship is ambitious but not necessarily ruthless. It shows a respect for others, and if winning is the goal, the fight will be a clean one. Victory will mean little for this pair if it is achieved through tricks or underhandedness. Instead, intelligent planning and tactics are given the highest priority.

Friendships in this combination may exist mainly on the mental plane, with an interest, perhaps, in games, puzzles and other activities of the mind. Gemini I friends are more trustworthy confidants than Gemini I lovers, and Leo-Virgos may come to depend on their often sage counsel, while also providing them with constructive criticism and advice about the furtherance of their careers.

Destructive conflicts over parental attention are likely to arise between Gemini I–Leo-Virgo siblings, especially of the same sex. Their struggles often spill out beyond the home, perhaps to school, the athletic field or social doings. Unfortunately, a bad habit of vying for the affections of a mutual friend or lover may continue into adolescence and adult life.

ADVICE: Success isn't everything. Find meaning within. Don't get caught up in useless competition. Respect confidences. Seek constructive goals.

Need for Change

This relationship's greatest achievement would be to harness its partners' skills to manipulate their environment and build something of lasting value. Their strengths can fuse synergistically in a powerful ability to persuade. Gemini I's have remarkable technical skills, yet rarely finish their projects. Should a Virgo I create a structure for them, these two could have a successful project, process or cause on their hands, together with an ability to convince others to buy, join, even believe. This area of strength, however, is also an area of conflict: Virgo I's need to preserve structure and Gemini I's to alter or eliminate it. The focus here can easily be the partners' struggle to convince each other of the need to either tighten or loosen a given structure (rules, the setup of home or workplace, schedules, budgets, etc.).

Emotional manipulation may play a role in love affairs. These two tend to bring out each other's nervous side, trying to influence each other by arousing fears and anxieties. The situation is unstable and offers little relaxation.

Persuasion plays an important role in marital, working and family relationships. Virgo I's usually feel more secure in an ordered situation that is only altered when a change will increase efficiency; Gemini I's prefer something looser, often changing things just because they enjoy it, and tire of stasis. But change itself isn't really the issue here, since ultimately both of these two can handle it comfortably. More to the point are the differences of opinion indicated by the square aspect (90° apart in the zodiac) between Gemini I and Virgo I. Their conflicts do provide the impetus for forward motion, but if harmony in the business or family group is to be preserved, they will have to be resolved.

Friendships can be relaxed, but here the partners' critical and analytical propensities (each sign is ruled by Mercury) come to the fore. If they can shift their mental emphasis into enjoyable activities involving thought (puzzles, games, books, the Internet, etc.), or apply it to cogent analyses of behavior—in other words, to self-insight—it can be extremely productive.

ADVICE: Reduce stress and tension. Put anxieties to rest. Agree on structural changes. Only implement essential rules. Increase easy cooperation.

Creative Projects

This unusual relationship tends to bring out fantasy and imagination in its partners. Its creative projects may require a high degree of inventiveness, and technical skill and craft are highly favored here. Expect clashes, however, between traditional and newer, more radical approaches to whatever science, skill or artistic endeavor is afoot. Gemini I's and Virgo II's may create highly personalized domestic situations and explore the byways of pleasure. Gemini I's are initially intrigued by the mysterious calm and reserve of Virgo II's, who in turn are fascinated by the unfettered, will-o'-the-wisp persona of Gemini I's. Virgo II's tend to dominate in this relationship, which may be for the best, since they are the more practical and stable of the two. As career partners, the pair may run a common business or, if engaged in separate careers, be available to help out when needed.

Love affairs give both partners' sensuousness and imaginativeness full rein, while involving a less romantic, more frank approach to sex. Marriage is often the next step after an intriguing affair, but others may show concern over a union between two people they see as having little in common. In fact the couple tend to be no less misunderstood as the years go by—their stability and endurance may amaze friends and family alike.

Friendships between these two provide endless amusement for relatively somber, isolated Virgo II's and serve to introduce a more meaningful social element into their lives. At the same time, Virgo II mystery will prove an ever fascinating challenge to curious Gemini I's. Activities of all sorts, perhaps involving travel, research, business or investment, may gel here. A career partnership between Gemini I–Virgo II friends or spouses may often prove engrossing.

Gemini I–Virgo II opposite-sex siblings may live in an isolated fantasy world as children, sometimes acting out the adult roles that they will follow when they are older. This special relationship may exhibit jealousies and claiming attitudes in adult life.

ADVICE: Beware of isolation. Fantasy should be grounded. Don't get stuck in unreality. Guard against claiming attitudes.

A Wave Function

Apparently unstable, this relationship, with its characteristic swings or oscillations, actually contains an innate regularity, a self-controlling mechanism. Like sound or radio waves, it has a periodicity of function, showing predictable highs and lows that appear at fixed intervals. It is not instability that typifies the relationship, then, so much as rhythmic change. Any kind of joint endeavor requiring the constant application of effort is not recommended here.

Both Virgo and Gemini are ruled by the speedy planet Mercury, which symbolizes change and communication. Thus Gemini I's and Virgo III's are on the same wavelength in matters of love, friendship and family. All of these relationships may resemble a roller-coaster ride, not unlike a literal graph of a wave function. Feelings in particular have marked peaks and troughs.

Marriages feature arguments about how things are to be done, and especially about who will do them. Gemini I's tend to take Virgo III practicality and capability for granted; annoyingly, they also tend to be absent just when a job needs doing. Such behavior can arouse resentment and anger in Virgo III's, resulting in bad looks and sharp commands. Friends and family may find such behavior overreactive or grouchy, but in fact it may be needed to keep wayward Gemini I's in line. The marriage is likely to feature battles over dominance and money.

Gemini I's and Virgo III's make excellent friends, but their friendships should be freed of the influence of romance or career. Neither partner should ever get the idea that the other has ulterior motives in mind. This relationship values natural and open behavior and has a hatred for pretentiousness or phoniness of any kind. Honesty is the yardstick for most of the pair's statements, so that Gemini I's are expected to curb their tendency to exaggerate while Virgo III's are urged to release hidden feelings. The half-truth may assume a curious role in such a relationship.

ADVICE: If you expect honesty, don't bend the truth. Balance confrontation and avoidance. Even out emotional swings. Normalize daily behavior.

VIRGO-LIBRA CUSP

Tenuous Connections

This relationship cries out for stability. Unfortunately, air, typical of fleeting and tenuous connections, is the predominant element here, making grounding unlikely. On the mental, thoughtful, logical or intellectual side, things can go extremely well, with eccentricity and imagination the hallmarks of mutual creativity. In more physical, emotional or instinctual matters, however, the relationship may demonstrate glaring deficiencies—not the least of them the inability to be there for each other in times of need.

Love relationships here will rarely go very deep. Good-looking Gemini I's to whom Virgo-Libras are attracted will feel appreciated, but may also sense that they are being treated more like beautiful objects than like worthwhile people. They may also find Virgo-Libra sensibilities snobbish, and think they are being treated patronizingly, something they will not tolerate. On the other hand, Virgo-Libras are not about to find the dependability they sorely need in Gemini I's. These affairs are perhaps better off if they do not lead to marriage.

Virgo-Libras and Gemini I's can make good acquaintances and occasional leisure-time companions. They seldom share deeply enough for real friendship to take place. The pity here is that these fair-weather friends may not take their casual but enjoyable bond for what it is, and may be disappointed when push comes to shove. Often this type of relationship will not survive such stress.

In family relationships, and particularly in parent-child matchups, it will be important to the partners to improve their image, surroundings, clothes, diet and education. Much of this drive will be the result of an unconscious need to keep up with the neighbors. Working relationships in this combination can be excellent, especially if they are built around fashion, design, music, investments, real estate or architecture. The relationship demonstrates a good eye for beauty and bargains, a solid appreciation of money and a good feeling for it, as well as a studied knowledge of the techniques of several fields of expertise. It also has the ability to convince customers.

ADVICE: Try to develop spiritually and physically. Ground yourself in the here and now. Meditate. Examine your values. Seek soulfulness and character.

Getting Along

These two individuals are not known for their social skills, a quality their relationship doesn't change. The primary challenge they face, then, will be to get along with each other on a daily basis. If they are to avoid argument, they will have to find sources of authority on which they can agree—neither of them is likely to take anything at face value. They are notoriously hard to convince, but together they may settle on a religious, political, philosophical, financial or artistic creed or set of beliefs that they can accept. (If they are co-workers, a company policy may do.) If this kind of common basis can be found, their arguments may become reasonable discussions, and the prediction of an easy relationship due to their trine position to each other (120° apart in the zodiac) will be partially fulfilled. They must take care, however, not to come off as bossy, authoritarian or supercilious toward others, at work or socially. Once they have formed a unit, they can easily adopt an "Us against the world" attitude.

Love between these two is likely to be intense—in fact, it must be moderated to avoid burnout. Even when their physical contact is gratifying, disagreements of all sorts may mar moods of contentment or exaltation. To know when to leave each other alone, they need to develop their intuition, and above all they must have faith in the relationship's abilities to heal wounds and promote understanding. Doubt, worry and control must be relinquished, leaving things to go as they will.

Marriages are most successful when the partners share a belief system. Coming from similar backgrounds can be a stabilizing factor. The danger is that intolerant or prejudicial points of view may influence children for the worse. Friendships and sibling relationships can be close, but if the pair hold opposing philosophies they can expect heated arguments. They typically get so involved in what they are doing that they are unaware of how disturbing they can be to others. Long after a Gemini I–Libra I confrontation has ended, observers may still be reeling from the fallout.

ADVICE: Monitor your noise level. Others may be irritated. Establish common lines of agreement. Don't just believe what you see. Have faith.

Laughing and Loving It

This relationship is generally just fun for both partners. It emphasizes enjoyment, whether in the personal, professional or family sphere. Not that the relationship can't get the job done; it can be extremely efficient and effective. But the partners believe that if something is worth doing it can be done the easy way or the hard way, and the easy way is obviously to be preferred. Loose and relaxed attitudes are valued highly here, and uptight, tense ones are eschewed.

Gemini I–Libra II love affairs and friendships are definitely pleasure oriented. Having a good time is given top priority. Those who view this relationship askance are likely to be thinking that it is shallow or superficial, but perhaps this is only jealousy; when two people can satisfy each other as easily and naturally as this pair, they must be doing something right. Particularly with friends, however, trouble may start just at the point where serious attitudes begin to emerge. Pollyannish relationships like this one are not really ready for trouble, and once it arises it may ruin the pair's good time. Should a major disaster or two appear—financial, academic, domestic or physical—this relationship may find itself on the brink of extinction.

Marriages usually have their share of woes and stress, and woes and stress are never the preferred mode for this couple. Unless they are prepared to take the bad with the good, ride through some heavy storms and even suffer unsolved problems for years, they had better not live together but remain friends or lovers.

Work relationships can be loads of fun, but can the work really get done? For the most part, yes—in fact Gemini I–Libra II co-workers can do a lot in addition to livening up the workplace. The social aspects of work are important, too, and the wit and ironic bite of this duo's sense of humor can serve to keep everyone on their toes—laughing, and loving it.

ADVICE: Try getting serious once in a while—seriousness need not signal the end of enjoyment. At some point it may be necessary to grow up.

THE WEEK OF THEATER
LIBRA III

Differences in Tempo

The challenge here will be to balance opposing energies. Tempo is a problem for these two: they can both be forceful, but Gemini I speed is disturbing to Libra III's, who are graceful and easy and prefer a measured approach. Perhaps seeing Gemini I's as interested more in getting what they want than in how they get it, Libra III's may feel rushed here. They in turn may annoy their partners through their consciousness of how others see them, a trait that Gemini I's may view as a despicably phony. The relationship must embrace compromise, tolerance and understanding if it is to have a chance of achieving balance. On the positive side, its innate persistence and ability to take on challenges can help these partners to find the middle way.

Love affairs may witness power struggles, with Gemini I's fruitlessly trying to control their partners. The Libra III need for a strong figure to depend on will not be met here, and the relationship's curve may describe a downward spiral. Marriages, though not enormously recommended, can work better because of their fixed and self-evident responsibilities. Their daily routines may ground Gemini I's, and physically maintaining a home may challenge their technical skills. Libra III's will appreciate these abilities, and by contributing their share to this job they may achieve a measure of balance. Gemini I's, however, may see themselves as having given up their most precious possession, freedom, and can feel cheated if career concerns keep their Libra III partner away a lot.

More balance may be achieved in friendships. These partners will seek each other out because they want to, not out of obligation. Their relationship can be dynamic and exciting, full of adventure and flamboyance, and is perhaps best when it offers a true escape from crushing responsibilities.

A lack of mutual respect and an inability to please each other make parent-child matchups difficult. Work relationships bound by fixed responsibilities may be more manageable, although differences in tempo can be annoying here, especially since, lacking intimacy, the partners may invest little energy in solving their personal problems.

ADVICE: Take the time to understand. Don't be so hasty. Neglect is a form of abuse. Try to build respect. Use your powers of analysis to gain insight.

THE CUSP OF DRAMA & CRITICISM
LIBRA-SCORPIO CUSP

A Fall from Grace

Love, affection and admiration may well be present in this difficult and complex relationship, yet these partners may ultimately find it difficult or impossible to accept each other. Part of the problem is the kind of adoration or worship that often occurs here: each partner's tendency to place the other on the pedestal offers the setup for a fall from grace. The relationship may continue for months or years in an almost paradisaical state, but this only makes the inevitable departure from Eden all the more difficult. The greatest challenge here will be for the partners to see each other as they really are, minus the projections and expectations.

Love affairs are often ecstatic, intense and rewarding, but act as a smoke screen against reality. The gradual realization that the person one is in love with does not correspond to one's ideal image of a lover can be truly painful. As reality creeps in, the partners have at least a chance of accepting each other for what they are, but instead may lose interest in continuing the relationship. Alternatively they may be unable to let go, perhaps because of a sex and love addiction, and this may be the most painful experience of all.

Marriages and friendships will require great efforts at honesty. Strong differences must be faced. Libra-Scorpios may be rejecting, but may also feel neglected and misunderstood, while Gemini I's feel unappreciated and baffled. The power struggles here often develop from an individual's striving to grow, which may not be possible within the relationship as it is. Friendships are a bit more flexible and conducive to growth, but objectivity is difficult to maintain. Family relationships can be especially trying. Parent-child relationships of either combination demand parental understanding and acceptance of the child's true nature. Children should be encouraged to make their own choices and accept responsibilities. Both dependency and disapproval must be met and overcome. Unreality, lethargy and a tendency toward procrastination do not allow for the best business or work relationships, which are not recommended for this combination, the roles of business partners or executives being particularly discouraged.

ADVICE: Cultivate acceptance and understanding. Suspend judgments. Make decisions and act on them. Don't let things drift. Learn to compromise.

Alternating Currents

In the unlikely event that this pair comes together in any way, their relationship will be deep, emotionally complex and fired by volcanic and often dark energies. Once initiated, the combination is difficult to escape from; it becomes self-perpetuating, even to the point of creating a mythological or ritualistic aura around itself. As when the poles of two magnets can repel each other but can also switch their orientation, becoming strongly attracted, so it is with these partners. The relationship's focus will be on the question of who takes the leadership role. Both parties can be aggressive about asserting their priorities, so they may have to trade off dominant roles in different areas of their relationship—money matters, for example, being controlled by the Scorpio I, social interactions by the Gemini I.

Love affairs and marriages in this combination are likely to involve fierce power struggles, with emotional insecurities and outbursts dotting the landscape. At first these two often dislike each other intensely. A love affair will begin suddenly, startling everyone, including them. The Scorpio I suspicion of glibness and versatility may seriously undermine the Gemini I's confidence, while Gemini I sarcasm and innuendo will upset thin-skinned Scorpio I's.

As friends these partners will take equal responsibility for decision-making, but easy give-and-take is difficult here. Scorpio I's make strong demands on their friends and are especially severe in matters of intention and morality. Gemini I's are usually less concerned about the motives behind their actions, and are also likely to transcend conventional morality when it suits them, both of which may incur strong Scorpio I disapproval. Still, overall, the relationship is well suited to friendships. Family connections may be mutually protective. Scorpio I–Gemini I siblings often stay loyal to one parent over the other in cases of divorce; they will generally want to stick together in such situations, and in this case their intuitive allegiance to a common authority solves the leadership problem well. The same kind of loyalty, but this time to a company, can make these two effective co-workers.

ADVICE: Give up power struggles. Try to talk without sarcasm or anger. Determine where talents lie. Take the lead only when necessary.

THE WEEK OF DEPTH
 SCORPIO II

Fine-Tuned Sensibilities

This relationship is apt to provide its partners with an opportunity to become more open-minded. If they are up to the task, it could open them to a whole new world, including the visionary or psychic. If this pair can get beyond their individual differences, they may enjoy an unusually colorful journey together.

In matters of love, rivalries may arise here over the affection of a common object of desire. Although both Gemini I's and Scorpio II's have an excellent sense of humor, together they may lack the ability to stay balanced. Competition between them can prove deadly serious. Marriage and love affairs in this combination, then, are not really recommended, since the prevailing mood can be one of mistrust. Harmony will be served if these partners can leave each other secure in their own value, resisting any impulse to try to tear down each other's character. They are likely to share a certain sensitivity, meaning both that they can be responsive to each other's needs and also, unfortunately, that they often get on each other's nerves. Should competition arise, the very insight into character that in other contexts has proved these personalities' strength can in this relationship become a weapon each of them uses to achieve selfish ends.

Should these two be friends, siblings or other relatives, the family or social group to which they belong can be rocked by rivalry. There are usually no winners here, and binding decisions are often difficult to agree upon or enforce. Unless parent-child or sibling combinations show great respect for and acceptance of each other, a mood of constant irritation may prevail. Gemini I's would do well to use their analytical powers and Scorpio II's their emotional understanding to lessen such tensions.

Unless these two are unbridgeably divided by age or cultural background, they can work well together, have a successful friendship, or even be friends who work together in the same career. Awareness of the other person's orientation, opinions and strengths is essential to success.

ADVICE: Tone down rivalries and arguments. Agree to compromise. Deal with irritations promptly. Put sensitivity in the service of understanding.

November 12–18

THE WEEK OF CHARM
SCORPIO III

A Parting of the Veil

Something makes these two keep secrets from the world: the inner workings of their relationship will always be private. Perhaps this is because they reveal sides of themselves to each other that they never show to anyone else, engendering a closeness that they may fiercely protect. Much energy will be tied up in how and when they confide in each other. Since they can't help but share their secrets, each of them ends up knowing a lot about the other one, and they may hold a kind of unspoken power or control over one another. One can't help but wonder what happens when the revelations run out: will the well of the relationship run dry, too?

Scorpio III's generally call the shots here, usually deciding how much of the relationship is revealed to the world, and when. Their self-sufficiency and stability inspire confidence in Gemini I children or employees, who may come to depend heavily on them as parents or bosses. Love affairs here are often covert, particularly if either partner is already involved in a primary relationship elsewhere. But Gemini I's have difficulty keeping secrets to themselves, and should they reveal Scorpio III confidences, or information about the affair itself, they will be sternly admonished and even threatened with rejection. In such situations Scorpio III's will rarely give them a second chance. The couple's passion is often directly proportional to how much of their relationship remains hidden.

Marriages between these two are extremely private, primarily through the influence of the Scorpio III. Freedom-loving Gemini I's may finally become fed up with this and seek solace elsewhere. Should they stray, they may be surprisingly good at hiding it from Scorpio III's, who may prefer not to know what's going on, or to suspect it but suffer in silence. Scorpio III's depend heavily on their friends, but Gemini I's must be careful not to take advantage of their good will. More independent Gemini I's will get along just fine in friendships with Scorpio III's, but more dependent ones will eventually be shown the door.

ADVICE: Waste less energy on biding. Develop freer attitudes. That much control isn't necessary. Let things unfold on their own.

SCORPIO-SAGITTARIUS CUSP

A Spiritual Bond

The focus here is spiritual—this is a relationship in which the partners may explore deeper, more idealistic topics, or engage in quiet contemplation together. They may, in fact, believe they share a higher calling. This doesn't preclude a certain zest and love of life, indeed in all their areas of interest—the arts, music, dance, belief systems, politics—enjoyment and fun with the world of ideas are important to them. This pair is interested in anything that affects the human condition. The world may view their relationship as active and even frenetic, but in doing so may fail to observe its personal and intimate side.

Marriages and love affairs are tricky for this combination. Both have a tendency toward infidelity, which their relationship accentuates, so that if it is to survive it will have to be very open, with few rules and little guilt or blame. Children of these spouses may have a difficult time with their parents' attitudes, and when older may be highly disapproving, even condemning of them. Gemini I-Scorpio-Sagittarius love relationships are likely to include both high passion and deeply negative emotions, especially jealousy, which can be all-consuming.

Friendships and sibling relationships here are likely to be close, particularly when of the same sex. The relationship is characterized by a desire to defend the underdogs and the disadvantaged of this world, but it also has a curious respect for money and power. Care must be taken, in fact, that it does not succumb to this latter tendency, compromising its own spiritual strengths.

Working relationships between these two may well be highly successful. Generally speaking, however, the Gemini I-Scorpio-Sagittarius duo will work no harder than is necessary, and will often conserve its strength for extracurricular activities. An unusual feature of a business partnership may be a religious or spiritual orientation underlying its financial or social dealings, and supplying a basis of trust in money matters.

ADVICE: Calm frenetic energies. Practice some form of meditation. Realize the value of silence, and of peace. Don't succumb to the lure of power.

THE WEEK OF INDEPENDENCE

Rigid Independence

Two freedom-loving people like these don't build a relationship easily. Their focus together, then, and their greatest challenge, will be to find a structure within which they can function, whether they derive it from career or family or tailor it for the relationship's needs. Finding a modus vivendi for these highly individual characters, whose independent attitudes can metamorphose in each other's company into a kind of rigidity, will indeed be a test of the combination's mettle. Gemini I and Sagittarius I lie opposite each other in the zodiac, and their changeable, protean nature (both are mutable signs, Gemini an air sign, Sagittarius fire) is magnetically attractive, unsettling and explosive.

Love affairs between these two may start out like a house on fire, but will lack the stability and understanding to proceed further, and simply burn out. Neither partner will be especially adept at helping the other with their psychological problems, which their relationship may actually intensify. Each needs a stable partner, and since neither of them is likely to meet this need, marriages in this combination may be problematic. Although each partner enjoys the other's freedom-oriented temperament, responsible Sagittarius I's may resent the evasiveness of Gemini I's when it comes to hard work, while Gemini I's may find Sagittarius I's judgmental.

Friendships between these two can work out extremely well, particularly when built around sports, fitness training or other physical activities. But the fixed moral attitudes of Sagittarius I's may be hard for Gemini I's to accept, especially when directed against them. The more rigid structures of career and family relationships will inevitably awaken rebellious attitudes; close Gemini I–Sagittarius I co-workers or siblings can be a thorn in the side of an inflexible boss or parent. Their independent stance will in turn provoke even more repressive authoritarian attitudes, pushing them into further solidarity and resistance—a potentially explosive cycle. As a parent-child or business-partner combination, Gemini I's and Sagittarius I's are apt to find their interactions limited or constrained in some way, maybe needing, for example, to make appointments in order to see each other.

ADVICE: Discharge tasks and obligations. Prove you are responsible. Create acceptable guidelines. Be more respectful of necessary rules.

Courtship Ritual

The need to understand others is crucial to this relationship. These two will be caught up in trying to figure out the morality of those around them, but perhaps their subconscious intention is to find a moral stance of their own, whether individually or together. Here we have a true meeting of equals, with mutual criticism and self-criticism playing roles in each partner's growth. The tone of the relationship is intellectual and rational, featuring analysis of each other's belief systems, or lack thereof. Sagittarius II complexity may intrigue Gemini I's, who, however, may ultimately be mystified by this partner's character; in fact, the Sagittarius II personality may become the pair's field of study. There may also be a fascination or obsession with the relationship itself, which demands understanding from its partners so that it can be nourished and grow.

Curiosity may be the force that brings Gemini I's and Sagittarius II's together. In friendships and love affairs, a growing mutual interest sparks investigation and a curious kind of courtship ritual, a dance through which they get to know each other. This organic process, proceeding in its own rhythm, will often be an indication of the relationship's health. At a certain point, it will either click or not. If it does, it may continue for years, changing and deepening; if it does not, it may simply fade away.

Marriages can work out here, often representing a positive evolution for their partners. They stand the test of time. These spouses will enjoy creating a living space together that reflects their unusual tastes. Particularly if children are involved, the marriage will be closely identified with its home base, and also with its neighborhood and social stratum. Sagittarius II's will feel accepted by Gemini I's, who in turn will be proud of their unusual mates, and inspired by their expressiveness and freethinking.

Gemini I–Sagittarius II co-workers will do better as freelancers, or perhaps as partners in a small business. Sibling and parent-child pairs are likely to be especially interested in solving the often considerable psychological problems raised by their own relationship.

ADVICE: Don't be obsessed with yourself. Look to others for guidance. Don't anticipate or create problems. Keep curiosity in check.

This relationship is full of contradictions. Gemini I's and Sagittarius III's are often outgoing personalities, yet their relationship is earmarked to be intimate and sensitive. Further, Gemini I's are ruled by air, the element of thought, and Sagittarius III's by fire, that of intuition, yet their relationship is governed by feeling. Thus their relationship puts a wholly unexpected emphasis on their inner, emotional life. It is also changeable in nature, in a way that makes it unfathomable and in the long run unsettling to its partners.

Love and marriage in this combination may offer these gregarious individuals a protective retreat from the world, but one that is difficult for them to understand. Sagittarius III's may not be quite as confident and together here as they appear in other areas. Gemini I's sense insecurities in them almost immediately, empathizing with their hidden problems without even being told about them. Once the trust of Sagittarius III's is gained, they may come to rely on Gemini I's to discuss personal difficulties, or even just to listen to their complaints. Gemini I's can also be complainers, but Sagittarius III's may be less patient in furnishing their ear.

This pair's differences in outlook come to the fore in friendships and working relationships. Where Sagittarius III's tend to see the big picture, Gemini I's like to concentrate on the individual data of experience, one by one. Their relationship emphasizes this polarity. The more factual Gemini I and the more philosophical Sagittarius III often argue over what course to follow, but a rapprochement is not out of reach, and an integrated, versatile and productive relationship can result.

Differences in outlook are less important in family matchups. Siblings in this combination can form a soulful bond, giving intimacy and privacy the highest status. Sharing secrets and being sympathetic to each other's difficulties play prominent roles here.

ADVICE: Reconcile differing points of view. Don't isolate yourselves. Develop intimacy but not dependency. Avoid giving the wrong impression.

THE CUSP OF PROPHECY
SAGITTARIUS-CAPRICORN CUSP

Moth and Flame

Enigmatic in the extreme, this relationship brings out complex energies and swirling emotions quite at odds with its facade of detachment. The effort to keep up this front can make this pair become frozen, or else lock them in even more to the currents between them. When they are alone together, it is almost as though they have been sucked down to some cavernous place, womblike but without enough air.

Gemini I's are attracted to Sagittarius-Capricorns like moths to a flame. The flame is a dark one, but the flitting Gemini I nature cannot resist its smoldering intensity. The fire-earth combination in Sagittarius-Capricorns indicates a passionate nature that arouses Gemini I emotions and makes them feel alive. This is not necessarily a good feeling by any means, for a good deal of negativity can emerge here. Sagittarius-Capricorns frequently push this partner's buttons, often silently, for example, by refusing to react or respond, or by acting as if they don't understand. Gemini I's have a tendency to repeat themselves, which may be matched and perhaps stimulated by the Sagittarius-Capricorn ability to forget what they have said. Thus one could find literal Gemini I communication being constantly swallowed up or absorbed by a Sagittarius-Capricorn well of silence.

Love affairs, marriages and friendships can all involve a lot of play-acting, with each partner taking on different roles. These games are not of the healthiest sort, but they are only roles, after all, and do not represent what these two are really like. Furthermore, on the plus side, they do enable Gemini I's to vent deep feelings that they might otherwise simply ignore, and allow Sagittarius-Capricorns to come out of the shadows and into the spotlight, exhibiting a theatrical, expressive and vibrant energy.

Family and work relationships in this combination are apt to be confusing, particularly since without more intimate forms of communication, these two will probably have difficulty understanding each other.

ADVICE: Drop the front occasionally. You don't have to act for the benefit of others. Strive for truth, not illusion. Be honest about your feelings.

Love Tango

Full of unrealities and impossibilities, this relationship has the quality of trying to catch air in a butterfly net, or drinking water out of a can with holes in it. On the surface, these two are a good match for each other: elusive, quick creatures who can evade responsibilities with maddening ease, Gemini I's might seem to be able to benefit from the company of Capricorn I's, who are masters of reality, setting boundaries and demanding observance of rules. But while they are effective in controlling their partner in other combinations, Capricorn I's simply can't get a handle on Gemini I's mercurial energies; the harder they try, the more slippery this partner becomes. Nor are Gemini I's attracted to traps, no matter how tender, so they are unlikely to let themselves be caught. They may temporarily pretend they have been caught, however, only to escape again when the careless Capricorn I gets overconfident and lax in vigilance.

In romantic relationships, the Gemini I–Capricorn I dance is a love tango in which the partners alternately catch each other and set each other free. As in a dream, realities shift quickly from the sensuous to the ethereal, from earthy to airy, from sexual to dispassionate. Emotions are as difficult to pin down as dancing partners in motion, and there are no guarantees of the outcome. In the end, however, the entire choreography is likely to resemble an exercise in frustration.

Marriages are quite uncertain, but this in itself is intriguing enough to keep freedom-loving Gemini I's and authoritative Capricorn I's from getting bored. On the outside the relationship might seem a futile search for stability, yet it can hang together mysteriously, year after year. Like an arch, the centerpiece is often held in place by gravity's downward pull on the other stones.

Friendships, family and work relationships are all both cursed and blessed by the unreality factor. Often the despair of others, the relationship is only understood by the partners involved—and then only on a good day.

ADVICE: Hold a steady course. Try to understand each other. Are you suffering and pretending to have fun, or having fun while pretending to suffer?

THE WEEK OF DETERMINATION
CAPRICORN II

A Hard Line

This relationship takes a hard line. Little need is felt here to cater to the niceties of etiquette or of polite society; formality is observed only when necessary, and no obligation is felt to be considerate of personal sensitivities or weaknesses. Indeed the relationship operates on the principle that experience is a toughening process, the ultimate education. Although the partners can feel warmly toward each other, particularly at the relationship's start, an adversarial stance may well emerge as they come to understand each other's outlooks, pulling them increasingly apart. If both partners are working toward a goal, however, as they are certainly capable of doing, the combination's toughness and practicality can achieve a lot.

Love affairs here are usually cool, no-nonsense and unemotional. Sex is dealt with frankly: the attraction is on or it is off; no attempt is made to compromise. Yet the relationship is not without romance, though a romance that may not be recognized as such by others, having a private meaning to the lovers themselves. Such relationships can develop into either marriages or friendships, but more often the partners slowly drift apart until their connection ends. Marriages between these two can be pragmatic. Capricorn II's contribute financial skills and domestic planning while Gemini I's lend a sharp eye for bargains and an aggressive instinct for furthering the family's interests. Although practicality is emphasized here, a love for beautiful objects and furnishings will lead this couple to spend time enhancing the ambiance of their home.

Friendships and work and family relationships will feature heated ideological or philosophical interchanges. The changeableness of Gemini I's will inevitably be confronted by the strong Capricorn II work ethic and stubbornness, while their finely honed critical faculties will pierce to the heart of any Capricorn II flaws. Mutual affection may offset the effects of insults and disparaging remarks. Boss-employee and parent-child relationships, in which the Capricorn II will probably play the dominant role, may exhibit pride in achievement but will rarely reach the kind of emotional understanding that allows easy exchanges to take place on a daily basis.

ADVICE: Keep it light. Don't let yourself get too serious; don't stick stubbornly to your point of view. Break down barriers to understanding.

CAPRICORN III

Going Through Labor

The challenge of this relationship is to promote psychological and spiritual growth. The problem is that both Gemini I's and Capricorn III's have an interest in antagonisms and struggles for power. Gemini I's are not really a match for this particular partner in this respect, but they are fighters, and their propensity not to give up may prolong any conflict. Capricorn III's are ultimately confident of their ability to dominate. Their need to be the boss is much greater than that of their partner in this combination, and if they appear to occupy a secondary position to a Gemini I boss, parent or even occasionally a spouse, this is only because they temporarily choose to do so. The relationship's struggles may seem to make mutual self-realization difficult or impossible, but conflict often serves to establish territory, to claim acknowledgment and respect for one's talents and to promote growth beyond individual differences. Between these two it may finally culminate in setting out on a more highly evolved path, either individually or as a pair.

Working through difficulties like these in love affairs, friendships and marriages is almost like going through labor in order to be born. The theme of rebirth often figures symbolically in such relationships, assuming that the two partners have enough interest and stamina to hang in there until the process is completed. Gemini I's sometimes opt out when the going gets rough, but their need for Capricorn III affection or sexual interaction can hold them magnetically. Capricorn III's are much less needy, but may find Gemini I's eminently entertaining to have around, and energetic and enthusiastic lovers.

Working and family relationships here are only favorable if they feature mutual respect. Otherwise, Capricorn III bosses or parents are unlikely to take Gemini I employees or children seriously, and vice versa. The more natural condition is for Capricorn III to play the dominant role, since Gemini I authority figures will probably find themselves at a loss trying to keep their Capricorn III subordinates in line. But roles that fit this pattern too closely may inhibit personal growth.

ADVICE: Take each other seriously. Respect for ability is key. Work through difficulties to find your own path. Promote cooperation.

THE CUP OF MYSTERY & IMAGINATION
CAPRICORN-AQUARIUS CUSP

The Perfect Work of Art

This can be a wild and wacky combination. A thirst for excitement characterizes the relationship, but so does a longing to achieve something of lasting value. There is an affirmation and celebration of creativity here, whether in fine art, literature, music, film—in short, a cherishing of any great work that transcends its time. This love of the classic suggests that the relationship puts a high value on perfection. The perfect artwork would be an apt symbol for what it holds most dear, but it also values people, living situations and, of course, relationships, which it subjects to the same high standards of scrutiny with which it treats art. Unfortunately, this means that the Gemini I–Capricorn–Aquarius relationship itself is likely to fall victim to its own demands.

In love affairs, both partners may find it hard to live up to the demands of perfection and continuity. Both Gemini I's and Capricorn–Aquarians have an impulsive and freedom-loving side that detests being bound to set routines or expectations. They may find each other endlessly challenging and changing, however, and in their encounters discover a kind of lasting, albeit kaleidoscopic, ideal.

Marriages can also be fascinating. Should children enter the picture, a predictable danger, of course, is that they too will be forced to fit the perfection model. Prestige and social pressures are less of a problem here, since the relationship has its own strong value system, but friends and family may be needed as watchdogs to see that oppressive and stultifying influences do not get out of hand.

Friendships and work relationships, which may be combined, capitalize on this combination's high energy level and occasionally bizarre tastes. Interesting and even absorbing in the extreme, the pair will attract others both socially and financially, promoting their own interests without a great deal of effort. It will probably be necessary for them to learn to relax their standards of expectation a bit while at the same time intensifying their work efforts. In the family, sibling matchups tend to be wild and uncontrollable.

ADVICE: Calm frenetic energies. Relax expectations. Perfection can be a tyranny. Take things as they are and as they come. The ordinary can be beautiful.

THE WEEK OF GENIUS
AQUARIUS I

Soufflé, Olé!

Light, quick, uncomplicated—these are the watchwords of the Gemini I–Aquarius I relationship. Because these two positions are at a trine aspect to each other (120° apart) in the zodiac, traditional astrology predicts an easy relationship between them, and is in this case perfectly correct—but not entirely complete. For the relationship between these two air signs is itself ruled by fire, indicating how explosive and unstable the combination can become. Neither Gemini I's nor Aquarius I's are the most responsible people in the world, after all, a tendency magnified when they combine. They may have trouble paying bills on time, being punctual, feeding the kids or the dog and in general keeping daily life together. Furthermore, any desire for this relationship to reach a deeper emotional level will be unfulfilled.

Love and marriages are best kept as free of responsibilities as possible: these two may decide not to have children, not to own a house, not to get tied down to a strict schedule. Freedom is key here, which means that there may be little to hold the relationship together in times of intense need and stress. The couple's attitude is that such times are not what they came together for, and if things are going badly—well, it may be time to look for a new partner. Like a good contract, their relationship leaves a lot of open exit doors, so that they avoid the feeling of being trapped.

Deep friendships and family relationships are probably neither possible nor desired, but companionships and acquaintanceships built around pleasurable activities are probably a good bet. Shared activities are the hallmark here and will be quite enjoyable. These are sociable relationships, often widening to include other people—for example, other family members—in vacation or picnic plans. Working relationships similarly often involve shared friends, family members, and friends of friends and family members. Small-business and freelance enterprises that allow maximum freedom and minimum responsibility are favored—these two can easily get frazzled and stressed out.

ADVICE: Dig a bit deeper. Taking on responsibilities will give you more stability. Plan a bit ahead. Face the fact that stress happens. Slow down a bit.

THE WEEK OF YOUTH & EASE

A Social Contract

Social interaction is this relationship's specialty. Directed out toward the world, and particularly concerned with establishing links between their own social or family group and a wider public, this pair can act as a kind of group representative, working to bring people and groups of people together and strengthen social ties. In short, these two are the ultimate networkers.

Even love relationships between Gemini I's and Aquarius II's are rarely isolated. Together they enjoy sharing with others the warmth and good feelings of their own relationship. This is not to imply a lack of intimacy—affection and love are prominent with this couple—but there is a need here, particularly on the part of the Aquarius II, to be appreciated by more than just their partner. The approval and appreciation of family and friends is quite important, then, and its absence may weaken the relationship.

Marriages in this combination are true social contracts. Family, friends, children, even co-workers are made welcome in the Gemini I–Aquarius II home. Feelings of fellowship and conviviality receive a high priority. But Gemini I's may need this kind of socializing a little less than their gracious partner, unfortunately, and may come to resent having to open their doors at all hours. Should this become a bone of contention between the two, somewhat crusty Gemini I's are likely to withdraw to their workroom, garage or bedroom and refuse to come out.

Friendships here are easy and of the no-hassle variety. The drawback is that they may be fair-weather choices, which may not survive even a moderately stressful period. By serving as a strong support group here, other friends and family may help preserve the relationship, providing the persistence that the combination itself does not. Gemini I–Aquarius II family and working relationships are often successful, but only within a firm social context. Should colleagues or co-workers become cut off or isolated from others, the relationship is likely to show tremendous strain and ultimately to break down.

ADVICE: Don't depend so much on the presence of others. Learn to work alone. Approval isn't really so important. Find value within yourself.

THE WEEK OF ACCEPTANCE
AQUARIUS III

Taking Bows Together

Gemini I's and Aquarius III's tend to compete for attention. Although they are attracted to each other, their relationship can be torn apart if they both depend on the recognition of a third party. Should they totally accept and feel fully appreciated by each other, their competition may abate, but it will rarely disappear. Another scenario is that their relationship may become recognized as an important entity in itself, so that they occupy the spotlight and take their bows together, usually in business, sports or the arts.

In an affair, these partners are likely to be crazy in love at first, but may end up feeling rejected and dejected. It is not absolutely clear how the downward spiral begins, but it may start with the kind of picky criticisms of which Gemini I's are capable. If the more accepting Aquarius III is not strong enough to check it, this habit can reach the point of being intolerable. Aquarius III insecurities will begin to emerge, and trust will gradually be withdrawn. Meanwhile, Gemini I's may be quite unaware of the catastrophic effect they are having on the relationship.

Judgmental Gemini I attitudes are also likely to surface in marriages and friendships. They sometimes involve the need to be boss that Gemini I's often show in this combination—Aquarius III's frequently take a back seat, at least emotionally, to these vigorously assertive individuals. Aquarius III spouses and friends will go a long way to accommodate Gemini I partners, but sooner or later will reach the limits of patience and acceptance. It is sometimes only when they withdraw their affection, or transfer it to another, that Gemini I's begin to wake up and realize what they have lost.

In the family and at work, Aquarius III's and Gemini I's are quite capable of taking what they have for granted. They tend to see their relationship as something that has always been there and always will be, a deadly assumption. Needs and wants can change over the years; these partners must monitor their relationship to be sure that it is functioning effectively, and then adjust and compromise accordingly.

ADVICE: Keep track of what is going on. Be sensitive to telltale signs. Don't take things for granted. Work to improve relations. Think constructively.

THE CUSP OF SENSITIVITY
AQUARIUS-PISCES CUSP

Dramatic Impulses

This relationship brings out the flamboyant side of both personalities, especially when they are engaged together in furthering their joint ambitions. Success is important to them, but only if it can be achieved with a certain style. Image obviously matters to this pair; what is less obvious is the importance of quality work. They will struggle hard to achieve their standard of excellence, while making it look like they are doing it easy.

Aquarius-Pisces are sensitive but have a worldly side that Gemini I's stimulate, rousing them from their psychological or physical retreat and urging them outward. Gemini I–Aquarius-Pisces energy can be aggressive, operating effectively in business, sports or the creative arts. Meanwhile, in personal relationships, Aquarius-Pisces can also stimulate a Gemini I's sensitive side, encouraging introspection and meditation.

This latter influence is felt in love, friendship and marriage. Self-exploration is an important theme here: the couple may spend long periods in intimate settings, exploring private sides of their characters together. This is not easy for them, as they may not be really trusting of the other at a deep level, but they do usually try—in fact they work on the relationship as hard as they work on anything else. The main thrust here, however, is outward. Dramatic and theatrical impulses may characterize the pair's public appearances; the emotional sharing that precedes these vivid displays may give them a basis without which they might seem to be false or empty posturing. Friends and family will find this couple stimulating but a trifle strange.

Family relationships between these two are often protective but dynamic, especially with siblings of the same sex. Parent-child relationships are problematic, often featuring power struggles and misunderstandings; a relationship in this combination between a child and a different relative may be more accepting, and a stronger positive force in early years. At work these partners are often imaginative and innovative. If they are co-workers, these talents may disturb those around them, but at a company's executive level, or in a partnership, their full force will be manifested, and will often bring success.

ADVICE: Be aware of disturbing others' feelings. Spend more time alone. Proceed on your path of self-discovery. Keep aggression under control.

Personal Challenge

The main thrust of this relationship is likely to be toward self-development, particularly of the cultural and spiritual variety. Although traditional astrology predicts conflict for these two, given their square aspect in the zodiac (where they lie 90° apart), this kind of friction is often stimulating, and leads to a positive result. Gemini I's are not overly introspective, and in their frenetic world a relationship with a more sensitive Pisces I is likely to prove a calm and soothing retreat. Pisces I's are inevitably put in the position of teacher, not so much imparting information as gently showing Gemini I's by example how to develop the deepest parts of their personality constructively. The Pisces I will inevitably also grow through such a process, and the relationship itself tends to be self-actualizing.

In love affairs, these two usually exhibit great sensitivity to each other's needs. These relationships tend to be highly private—the inner growth they manifest is not for the world's scrutiny. Affection and pleasure are certainly part of such a relationship, but its principal value is educational, possibly of a spiritual kind, and especially for a Gemini I who has not previously been exposed to the influences or sensibilities typical of a Pisces I. Such relationships, however, may put great strain on Pisces I's, who may find their partner demanding and lacking in concentration, a trait that tends to make Pisces I's nervous.

Marriages here may affiliate themselves with a religious, spiritual or cultural group, which can become an important source of stability. Should this bond become too strong, however, and should it end in disillusionment, it may lead to extreme upset, often resulting in separation or divorce. Parents must beware of forcing religious or spiritual ideas or rituals on their children, ultimately encouraging rebellion.

Gemini I–Pisces I friendships and family and working relationships tend to be exclusive, often arousing animosity or jealousy in other people. The pair will have to develop their diplomatic skills if they are to avoid conflict.

ADVICE: Don't close yourself off from people. Others may view your belief as conceit. Don't be self-satisfied. Strive for what is best in you.

A Thought/Feeling Split

This relationship would be expected to exhibit a polarization between emotion and logic. Pisces II's (ruled by the element water, which symbolizes feeling) and Gemini I's (ruled by air, which represents thought) are here brought together in a relationship in which such extremes rarely meld harmoniously, although things may go well for periods of time. The duo's real strength, and its greatest challenge, is the ability to combine their strengths so that they can meet crises with a compassionate yet commonsense point of view.

Love relationships here are rare. Their success depends on whether speedy Gemini I's can be sensitive and understanding enough of their slower Pisces I partners. The polarization of emotion and thought here can ultimately prove destructive to the relationship's chances for success. Marriages demand more unity, and domestic obligations will often both tie freedom-loving Gemini I's to fixed responsibilities and force Pisces II's to fulfill social roles sometimes that they would rather ignore. In the best-case scenario, although some inconvenience and even resentment may surface, compromise is possible.

Friends in this combination can be extremely understanding of the problems of other people, and their emotional intelligence as a pair often attracts others in need of psychological support or advice. In rare cases it is even possible for them to put this talent to professional use. Friendships do not arouse strong emotions, and the increased objectivity improves the matchup's atmosphere. Tendencies on the part of Gemini I's toward selfishness and of Pisces II's to self-pity will have to be dealt with, however, or they will undermine the relationship.

Working relationships on the job are not favored here, but freelance enterprises combining Pisces II imagination and Gemini I forcefulness can succeed. Family relationships, on the other hand, are difficult, especially parent-child matchups of the same sex. All kinds of conflicts emerge here, often due to extreme Pisces II sensitivity and need to be understood and Gemini I inability to do so. A rapprochement can be effected later in life, but Gemini I inconsiderateness and Pisces II resentment may remain insoluble problems.

ADVICE: Have you really tried to understand? Look outside your own world. Pay attention to the needs of others. Calm your nerves and center yourself.

Displays of Temperament

If both partners are set on the same goal, this relationship is next to unstoppable. The secret is the pair's ability to think strategically, to plan and to wait for the perfect moment to act—so long, that is, as they are acting together. Separately, Gemini I's and Pisces III's lack these talents, and are actually somewhat out of touch with reality. The greatest challenge they face, however, will be their ability to get along on a daily basis. Irritation and dissatisfaction will often surface between them, and should the relationship develop into a power struggle, they are likely to tear it apart. Each partner's near-omniscient streak makes argument inevitable. If the relationship is characterized by a know-it-all attitude, it may become off-putting to friends and family, alienating those forced to listen to it.

Gemini I–Pisces III love affairs are not recommended. They tend to be contentious and exhibitionistic, and to include a range of emotional expression that is full but that leans to the negative variety. Outsiders sometimes get the idea that a fight is being staged for their benefit, and indeed this couple may secretly enjoy public displays of temperament. The power to upset each other and others is a constant temptation, and until the partners learn the value of moderation, passionate reconciliations are about the best they can expect.

When not arguing, Gemini I's and Pisces III's are remarkably well suited to each other as mates and friends, and can share many interests and activities. Should they have children, it will become essential for them to tone down their confrontations, which can induce nervous, neurotic and imitative behavior patterns in the young. What makes Gemini I–Pisces III work combinations so powerfully effective, despite their instabilities, is shrewd business sense and understanding of human nature. Running a business together or working as part of a project team takes the spotlight off personal conflicts and directs energies toward a common goal. Parent-child relationships here are stormy but also loving, particularly between fathers and daughters, mothers and sons. Brother-sister relationships can be especially close and understanding.

ADVICE: Try to mute dissent. Turn arguments into conversations. Learn to compromise and back off. Relinquish omniscient attitudes.

Heavy Verbal Traffic

Verbal traffic is at an all-time high between these two communicators. Being together gives them the green light, and they are likely to shift into high gear fast. One danger is that the stream of words may eventually become no more than a hum or buzz. Another is that these motor mouths' mutual love of debating can take over the relationship, creating a win-at-all-costs attitude. The question is: Do they talk to each other or at each other? Listening is a challenge here, and listening is at least half of the communicative process. Furthermore, since both of these Gemini II's have their own, highly individual language, comprehension between them may not at first be high. Should the relationship gel, they may create their own private language, communicating with each other easily but having difficulty being understood by others.

If lovers in this combination want to deepen their relationship, they must try to put aside language in favor of physical, emotional and even spiritual communication. Nothing will more quickly put a damper on ecstatic sexual or romantic experiences than talking them to death, or analyzing them—either during or after. Marriages are likely to be hectic, even frenetic or, occasionally, hysterical. Gemini II's pay attention to details, and there are usually enough of these needing attention around the house to keep them busy for years. Should a mutual preoccupation with trivia prevail, the marriage may approach the obsessional and neurotic. Worry and anxiety are enemies here.

Friendships and work relationships may alleviate stress by objectifying emotions and putting the emphasis respectively on fun-filled activities and on getting the job done. But stress will increase enormously when problems arise or quotas and deadlines are not met, and the question is whether the relationship will have the resources to hang in there and cope with it. Gemini II verbal skills can sometimes be put to use solving this problem and planning for the future. Within the family, if the Gemini II stream of language is not well directed, endless debates, fights and misunderstandings are likely to occur.

ADVICE: Practice listening. Find a quiet place inside, for example by practicing meditation. Learn to turn off the motor. Make a greater effort to be understood.

The Details of the Big Picture

A lively and original relationship can spring up between these two. Their thinking begins with a love for details but steadily develops to encompass the larger line and the bigger picture. They may quite possibly engage in expansive entrepreneurial or social enterprises together, ambitiously plumbing uncharted waters. But if the relationship's feeling for adventure and excitement is not counterbalanced by a focus on security and dependability, the best-laid plans may dissolve into thin air.

Love affairs between these two are likely to be exciting but somewhat unstable. Sexual energy runs high, but romantic feelings alone are usually not enough to hold the relationship together for these two can be pretty cool customers who know what they want. Sharing activities of all sorts, but especially those involving communication, are essential if the affair is to proceed further. Should Gemini II's and Gemini III's marry, they will probably have precise plans for their home, children (if any), neighborhood, career, vacations and so forth.

Friendships can suffer a split in attitude—Gemini II's enjoy talking about things while Gemini III's prefer doing them. As a result, Gemini II's may see Gemini III's as a bit rash, uncontrolled and insufficiently thoughtful, and in return may find that their partner thinks of them as all talk, no action. Both work and family relationships will benefit from engagement in shared projects. These two travel well together, and can make an eloquent case for a company or family group. Presentation is a strong point with them, and they will pay close attention to image—clothing, personal hygiene, makeup, perfume, everything is covered down to the last detail. Parent-child and boss-employee relations may be particularly favorable, lacking resentment or rebellion, although healthy competition is to be expected among co-workers and siblings.

ADVICE: Let up in judgmental attitudes. Not everything has to be under control. Let things take their course. Don't just talk—act!

RELATIONSHIPS

STRENGTHS: INVESTIGATIVE, SUPPORTIVE, UNDERSTANDING WEAKNESSES: CLAIMING, OVERPROTECTIVE, ISOLATED

Richer Understanding

This relationship often involves a search for self. Questions about identity, fulfillment and the soul will predominate here, with the partners not only sharing their personal journeys but pondering their relationship as it deepens and grows. Although they may seek external goals, their relationship is more likely to try to deepen itself through inner exploration, plumbing psychological, emotional and perhaps spiritual realms. Gemini II's have a shadow side that longs for understanding; being good and sympathetic listeners, Gemini-Cancers are just the people to counter their fear of looking foolish and to help them to know themselves. The emphasis on inner growth here is also just the ticket for thoughtful and profound Gemini-Cancers, who will benefit from the enthusiasm of Gemini II's and from their ability to share ideas and information.

Love affairs are likely to center around both partners' need to be understood and accepted. Gemini-Cancers often know a good deal about themselves, but Gemini II's will often need a better understanding of themselves, especially their suppressed dark side, before the relationship really begins to develop. A complex process is often at work here: investigation of each partner's individual personality can broaden into a richer understanding not only of the relationship but of other people, even of life itself. Expressing love and intimacy is the reward of such a process. Marriages continue the evolution of these affairs. At first, Gemini II's are likely to back off from a long-term commitment—Cancer-Geminis will have to show patience and steadfastness here. Once the commitment is made, however, Gemini II's are devoted and dedicated spouses.

Gemini II–Gemini-Cancer friendships are more externally oriented. A love of nature may prompt this pair to explore beautiful countryside or simply to take walks in city parks. Peaceful relaxation together is also part of the picture. Work relationships are unlikely to be dynamic when they involve repetitive tasks and well-defined goals, but more inspirational endeavors may stimulate higher energy levels. Parent-child relationships can be accepting and nurturing, but overprotectiveness and dependency may inhibit growth.

ADVICE: Deepen the process of understanding. Don't cut yourself off from the world. Stay physically active. Allow for individuality.

CANCER I

Drifting Off on a Cloud

Magnetic attractions can manifest between these highly different personalities. The focus here is often unrealistic, however, featuring grandiose schemes or plans and visions of idyllic futures. This pair could easily embark on the proverbial wild goose chase together. Part of the problem is a deep need to communicate, yet Gemini II's and Cancer I's have such different styles that the only time they seem to meet is when dreaming, predicting or prophesying. In fact, they could easily squander a lot of money running to mediums, channelers, tarot readers or other types of psychics.

Cancer I's are feeling types, but their mental faculties are often stimulated by a verbal and intelligent Gemini II. They may often be frustrated by Gemini II's indirectness, but ultimately they are up to the task of learning this partner's language. Gemini II's for their part will benefit from this relationship's characteristic kind of communication, which occurs on a nonverbal, often emotional level. Sharing strengths is an important dynamic here.
